ART.

MEISSONIER: his Life and his Art.

By VALLERY C. O. GRÉARD, de l'Académie Française.

Translated by Lady MARY LOYD and Miss FLORENCE SIMMONDS.

Also an ÉDITION DE LUXE, in 2 vols. printed on Japanese Vellum, with a Duplicate Set of the Photogravure Plates on India Paper and separate portfolio. This Edition is limited to 100 numbered and signed copies. 6*l.* 6*s.* net.

ACADEMY.—"Seldom has artist received so sumptuous a memorial. An invaluable compendium of the life and labours of one of the most remarkable French artists of the century."

THE CASTLES OF ENGLAND:
Their Story and Structure.

By Sir JAMES D. MACKENZIE, Bart.

In 2 vols. imperial 8vo. with 40 Full-Page Plates, 160 Text Illustrations, and many Plans, 3*l.* 3*s.* net.

PALL MALL GAZETTE.—"No work has hitherto appeared dealing with this fascinating subject that can approach these sumptuous volumes in accuracy, erudition, or pictorial ornament."

BELLES-LETTRES.

THE WORKS OF LORD BYRON.

Edited by W. E. HENLEY. In 12 vols. with Portraits and Illustrations.

Vol. I. LETTERS, 1804-1813. With Portrait after Phillips. Crown 8vo. 5*s.* net.

The Works of Lord Byron. Edited by William Ernest Henley.—Letters, 1804–1813. (Heinemann.)

THERE is plenty of work for two or three competent editors to do during the next few years for the text of Byron's writings and the elucidation and illustration of his poetry and prose; but it is not quite clear that Mr. Henley and his publisher have been well advised in entering upon so serious an undertaking as an edition of all Byron's writings available for their use, prose and verse, just when the public has become sufficiently alive again to the importance of Byron to be greatly interested in the question, "What will Mr. Murray and Lord Lovelace do in the final edition of the poetry which they are said to have in hand?" It is beyond question that a very heavy labour of minute research, requiring great judgment and experience, awaits the man who is to deal worthily with the family archives and the masses of material stored at Albemarle Street in connexion with the poetry alone. An expert and a critic in one is, however, needed for the work, if it is to be done properly. Mr. Henley, so far as elucidation and illustration are concerned, has an open field and is fully equipped. The copyright of Moore's contributions of material by or about Byron is extinct, as is that of a vast number of Byron books of more or less consequence; but the proper settlement of the text is hampered by restrictions that an editor must either ignore and leave his work imperfect, flout and risk a lawsuit, or arrange with constituted authorities.

Mr. Henley in his preface says that his edition of Byron's prose will be "divided into (1) Letters; (2) Journals and Memoranda; and (3) Miscellanies—as the epistle to Roberts, the 'Vampire' fragment, the 'Observations upon "Observations,"' and the like." The text is stated to be "reprinted from Moore, from Dallas, Leigh Hunt, J. T. Hodgson, and the rest," and all Mr. Henley seems to claim for his edition is that, "incomplete as probably it is, it is practically the first reissue on novel and peculiar lines which has been attempted for close on seventy years." The first instalment is a thick volume of 490 pages, of which 290 are devoted to the text of certain letters written by Byron to various correspondents during the years from 1804 to 1813. Most of the remainder is devoted to the annotation of the same. The letters themselves are in a clear and readable type; but the comment is printed in too small a size for comfort even to unimpaired eyesight. Indeed, although this comment is but a pot pourri, it is like the best pots pourris, well spiced, and deserved a better treatment at the printer's hands.

The letters printed by Moore are here given without the interruption of Moore's setting; but of that setting a great deal is retained, mixed up with other extracts, in Mr. Henley's notes. There is astonishingly little in the letters themselves with which the Byron reader is not already familiar, for by "Dallas, Leigh Hunt, J. T. Hodgson, and the rest," we are to understand that Mr. Henley has been digging (1) in those three rich volumes* which the Rev. A. R. C. Dallas published in Paris in 1825, being restrained by an injunction of the Court of Chancery from publishing the work in England; (2) in 'Lord Byron and some of his Contemporaries,' published by Leigh Hunt in 1828; and (3) in the 'Memoir of the Rev. Francis Hodgson, B.D., Scholar, Poet, and Divine, with Numerous Letters from Lord Byron and Others,' two volumes, which Hodgson's son, the Rev. J. T. Hodgson, published through Messrs. Macmillan & Co. no longer ago than 1878.

Letters No. 51 and No. 52 read a little unfamiliarly, and we find from an unobtrusive note at p. 333 that "certain sentences" are "here restored from the originals in Mr. Alfred Morrison's Collection of Autographs." This is a somewhat provoking confession, because if Mr. Henley was able to arrange with the proprietors of the copyright for power to avail himself of an autograph collector's courtesy in respect of these two letters, why, one wonders, could not similar arrangements have been made as to other letters of which the holographs are extant and the printed text is lamentably defective through omission and manipulation?

However, this instalment of the text of Byron's letters must not be taken too seriously. Mr. Henley's notes, on the other hand, are of really sterling value, for they are full of brilliant pictures and marked by praiseworthy erudition. So far as they are gathered from "Moore, Leigh Hunt, J. T. Hodgson, and the rest," there is too great a proneness to break off in the middle of an extract with an impatient "&c.," as if the condescension of quoting at all were a great strain upon our commentator. The whole series of these notes would not exactly make a book; but it would be an agreeable experiment to try what good reading they would make if printed with due elimination and revision, in bold type, in a handy volume apart. The brief studies or memoirs of the many men and women forming the Byron circle, or mentioned by him to his several correspondents, are as graphic and well compacted as need be; and we would commend specially to the reader's attention those on Dallas (p. 309), Harness (p. 311), Jackson the pugilist (p. 316), Francis Hodgson (p. 319), Hobhouse (p. 321), Augusta Leigh (p. 364), Moore (p. 378), Southey (p. 388), Galt (p. 402), the Countess of Jersey (p. 403), Lady Caroline Lamb (p. 407), Scott (p. 415), and Rogers (p. 433). That on Leigh Hunt (p. 435) shows too much animus even for the purposes of Mr. Henley's obvious "hero-worship" for Byron. Indeed, impartiality is not to be reckoned among Mr. Henley's foibles; he is a good honest hater, and his Byron worship is somewhat of that curious strain which excludes not only Byron's enemies, but his opposites—as Shelley. In fact, his notes, in spite of their brilliant qualities, are by no means free from faults and flaws. We mention a few points which have struck us on a first perusal.

At pp. 299–300 the reader is told of the 'Fugitive Pieces,' Byron's first book, the renowned quarto of 1806, that it

> "was printed for him by Ridge of Newark in the November of the same year; but the issue was burned—so thoroughly was the thing done that only one copy is known to exist—at the request of Becher, who found a certain number, 'To Mary' unduly voluptuous in intention and effect."

This not very clearly expressed sentence, which we give precisely as punctuated in the book, is clear in one point, at all events, viz., that only one copy is known to exist. Moore's statement on the subject is that two, or at the most three, escaped the Becher-Byron holocaust. Thus far Moore's statement has not been shaken. "Two, or at the most three," expresses admirably the publicly known state of the case to-day: Becher's own copy, another complete copy, and an imperfect one (wanting the peccant poem) are still in existence. The quarto has also been reprinted privately in beautiful type facsimile.

In annotating at pp. 303–4 the early caricature sketch of Dr. Butler, under the name of "Pomposus," Mr. Henley might have remarked that Byron was already borrowing from Churchill, who, in the satire of 'The Ghost,' had given the same name, though in its Italian form "Pomposo," to Dr. Johnson. At pp. 315–16 is a note on Samuel Jackson Pratt, which does not mention the poem called 'Bread; or, the Poor,' popular in its day, finely illustrated, and serviceable to Shelley in compiling the notes to 'Queen Mab,' although a line of identification would have been useful, as the book has many titles: 'Cottage Pictures; or, the Poor,' on the title-page; 'Bread; or, the Poor,' in the headlines; 'The Poor; or, Cottage Pictures,' at foot of the engravings. Shelley cites the poem as 'Bread; or, the Poor.' There is also a small sin of commission here, as well as that of omission: Mr. Henley makes the man whom he goes a little out of his way to vilify a Buckinghamshire man, "born at

* The title, which tells a tale essential to be known, is as follows: "Correspondence of Lord Byron with a Friend, including his Letters to his Mother, written from Portugal, Spain, Greece, and the Shores of the Mediterranean in 1809, 1810, and 1811. Also Recollections of the Poet. By the late R. C. Dallas, Esq. The Whole forming an Original Memoir of Lord Byron's Life, from 1808 to 1814. And a Continuation and Preliminary Statement of the Proceedings by which the Letters were suppressed in England at the Suit of Lord Byron's Executors. By the Rev. A. R. C. Dallas. [3 vols. 12mo.] Paris, published by A. & W. Galignani, at the English, French, Italian, German, and Spanish Library, 18, Rue Vivienne, 1825."

St. Ives (Bucks)." No such place is known to geographers; and St. Ives in Huntingdonshire claims the honour, such as it is, of being Pratt's birthplace.

The masterly little sketch of Gifford at p. 326—one of the best of such vignettes—would have been truer in its sense of proportion had there been an allusion to Hazlitt's wonderful 'Letter' and Leigh Hunt's 'Ultra-Crepidarius.' Mr. Henley need not allow prejudice against Hunt to deprive him of a telling illustration. And after all, if Gifford did good service to literature against the Della-Cruscans and Peter Pindar, Hunt did better in forestalling the scorn of Mr. Henley himself for this contemptible thing Gifford, as he clearly did in his very clever, if not sufficiently venomous poem. Perhaps it would have been better for Mr. Henley's case against Hunt if he had stated it a little less strongly; for Hunt, with all his faults, was a good fellow on the whole, and still has numerous living relations and friends who cherish his memory.

At p. 331 'The Battle of the Nile' might fairly have been expected to find a place among Sotheby's "mediocre verse," of which there is such a curious display.

Accuracy in quoting his hero's own poetical works is not to be reckoned among Mr. Henley's strong points. At p. 346, in illustration of the passage in which Byron tells his friend Francis Hodgson how "two days ago" he "swam from Sestos to Abydos," the editor mentions "the lines in 'Don Juan':—

> A feat on which ourselves we rather prided
> Leander, Ekenhead, and I did."

The misquotation not only destroys the metre, but does away with the exquisite drollery of the real passage, which is (canto ii. stanza cv.):—

> A better swimmer you could scarce see ever,
> He could, perhaps, have pass'd the Hellespont,
> As once (a feat on which ourselves we prided)
> Leander, Mr. Ekenhead, and I did.

The note on Byron's reference to "Anacreon Moore's new operatic farce" is hardly sufficient. Hodgson, it seems, had forestalled Thomas Hood in the very punster's motive of that immortal piece of imaginative wit 'The Wee Man'; and in elucidation of Byron's reply all that Mr. Henley says is:—

> "This [the farce] was 'M.P., or the Blue-stocking,' produced at the Lyceum, 9th September, 1811. The author was far from proud of his work. But eight songs from it are included in his 'Works'; and poor enough they are."

Now 'M.P.; or, the Blue-stocking,' was not merely produced on the stage in September, 1811, but was published as a book the same year with a preface dated the 9th of October, and, whether in pride or in humility, signed in full by Thomas Moore. In the same year, too, he issued a separate pamphlet containing the lyric portions only, without the prose substance of the farce. Both book and pamphlet are scarce, but not so scarce that an editor has a dispensation to leave them unfound and unnoticed.

Bishop Watson is dismissed with disproportionate brevity in the note (pp. 387–8) to Byron's record that he has read "Watson to Gibbon." It would have been at least interesting to find the bishop identified as the same notable ecclesiastic who wrote the 'Sermon and Appendix of Strictures on the French Revolution,' which called forth from Wordsworth one of his best prose works, the 'Apology for the French Revolution,' written in 1793, but not published till 1876, when Dr. Grosart did a service to the world by giving it from the manuscript in his edition of 'Wordsworth's Prose Works.'

On Byron's good, sensible, worldly-minded letter to the Quaker poet Bernard Barton, printed at pp. 199–201, there is, of course, a note, but not, to our thinking, one quite adequate to the occasion. "Do not renounce writing," says Byron, "but never trust entirely to authorship. If you have a possession, retain it; it will be like Prior's fellowship, a last and sure resource." Mr. Henley does not suggest that "possession" is a mistake of some one's for profession, though the moral which he points in recording (p. 413) that Barton was "forty years clerk in a bank at Woodbridge" of course illustrates "profession." The only works he mentions are 'Metrical Effusions' (1812), 'Poems by an Amateur' (1817), and 'Poems' (1820). Barton's books and biography literally bristle with literary allusions and connexions; but "being," as Mr. Henley says, "a very amiable and respectable man, as well as a writer of not displeasing mediocrity," there was no sufficient inducement to take the trouble of stating the good man's career proportionately. His connexion with Edward Fitzgerald might, however, have been mentioned with advantage.

Loyalty to Byron or any other poet need scarcely bind a commentator to take at his idol's valuation every one who has to be dealt with. When Byron writes (p. 235) to Mr. Murray, "I presume all your Scribleri will be drawn up in battle array....Mr. Bucke, for instance," it is not incumbent on the commentator, however staunch to his hero, to dismiss the allusion to Charles Bucke with—"For an account of this scribbler's quarrel with Edmund Kean, see Hawkins, 'Life,' &c., ii. chapters v. and vi.," and a few lines of caustic remark from Scott to Southey, as Mr. Henley does at p. 232. "Any schoolboy" can translate Scriblerus into scribbler. It is quite right, of course, to refer to F. W. Hawkins's book, but justice demands that Bucke's version of the quarrel should be cited as well as that of Kean's advocate. See also the preface to Charles Bucke's tragedy of 'The Italians.'

Why, at pp. 438–9, 'The "Living Dog" and "The Dead Lion"' should have been quoted from a copy incorrectly made by Augusta Leigh, and now in Mr. Alfred Morrison's great collection of autographs, is not altogether evident, and it has tempted Mr. Henley into the inaccurate subheading "Thomas Moore to Leigh Hunt." The verses were not addressed to Leigh Hunt—could not be in the nature of things; and, for the rest, Mrs. Leigh, without preserving a single variant of even the most trifling significance, made such bad slips of transcription that Mr. Henley had to remedy some of them by interpolations in brackets. If he did not like to be beholden to Moore's 'Satirical and Humorous Poems' for his extract, he might have gone back either to the Times, where the piece first appeared, or to the 'Odes upon Cash, Corn, Catholics, and other Matters,' in which Moore reprinted it anonymously in 1828. He would not then have had to submit to the damage which Mrs. Leigh's careless copying did to the brilliant Irishman's brilliant rapier-thrust. By the omission of the pause and one comma from the last line, the best quatrain in the poem—though the coarsest—is unfortunately spoilt in the Leigh-Henley version.

When all is said, the book is still one with which we cannot but desire to "part friends." The letters themselves are mostly good reading. The editor has culled from Moore, Scott, Rogers, Hobhouse, Scrope Davies, "and the rest," a great mass of printed or reported utterances which are also quite interesting; and the best of his own vignettes are excellent pieces of writing, and do him no little credit.

Eighteenth Century Vignettes. Third Series. By Austin Dobson. (Chatto & Windus.)

MR. DOBSON'S new volume of 'Eighteenth Century Vignettes' enables his readers once more to renew their acquaintance with an epoch now eminently in fashion. They can frequent its theatres and other places of amusement, mix in its fashionable or literary society, be present at a state trial before the peers in Westminster Hall, or attend the sales of famous libraries at Mr. Samuel Baker's auction rooms in York Street, Covent Garden; they can see something, too, of the eighteenth century booksellers, and look in at one or two of the printers' "chapels" from which were issued the pamphlets of Swift and Defoe and the poems of Prior and Pope. Those who are interested in the topography of old London may, with Mr. Dobson as their guide, stroll through Covent Garden and its neighbourhood as it existed in the days of Hogarth. After inspecting the old church of St. Paul's, and hearing of the distinguished men who have found a last resting-place, though not a quiet one, in its graveyard, the would-be antiquary can wander on through the neighbouring streets, where Mr. Dobson will point out the houses of interest and tell him a good deal more gossip about their former inhabitants than these worthies ever thought would be revealed to a curious world. There is, as everybody knows, a great deal to be said about a region so full of literary and histrionic associations, and no one could wish for a better cicerone than our author.

One of the most interesting vignettes in the volume is a description of M. Grosley's 'Londres,' a work describing the author's experiences during an eight weeks' visit to London in the early part of 1765. M. Grosley knew nothing of our language, but this ignorance was, he thought, an advantage, as "his inability to understand our tongue did but enhance and intensify his native acuteness of vision." He was certainly a keen observer with a strong sense of the ridiculous, and during his stay in London he had many opportunities of making use of his natural endowments. "M. Grosley," writes Mr. Dobson in a passage which affords a good specimen of his style,

"was fortunate in happening upon an unusually eventful time. Already King George had been attacked by the first of those mysterious illnesses which ultimately incapacitated him as a practising monarch, and to this, during M. Grosley's sojourn among us, was to follow the second Regency Bill, with all its anti-Bute plotting and counterplotting. Then Lord Byron had killed his cousin Mr. Chaworth, of Nottinghamshire, in a quarrel at the Star and Garter in Pall Mall, and the galleries had already been erected for his lordship's trial by his peers in Westminster Hall. Moreover, the Spitalfields weavers were to make new demonstrations against the clandestine importation of French silks, marching in their thousands under black banners.....It is true that at this date some notable and notorious persons were unavoidably absent from London. Mr. Laurence Sterne, for instance, who had not long published vols. vii. and viii. of 'Tristram Shandy,' was at the Bath, and Mr. Garrick was at Paris.....Mr. Whitefield was still in America; Mr. John Wilkes was luxuriating at Naples; and Miss 'Iphigenia' Chudleigh had betaken herself to the German waters. On the other hand, there were rumours that Rousseau was coming to England, and (perhaps) the Duc de Nivernais; while if Roscius was not rejoicing his admirers in Drury Lane, Foote would soon be delighting the devotees of broad-grin at the little theatre in the Haymarket. At Vauxhall and Ranelagh the season was approaching; and the exhibition of the Society of Artists at the Great Room in Spring Gardens was on the point of opening."

Of these opportunities of studying the manners and customs of the English M. Grosley made a good use, and except with the lower classes his experiences of our country were not unfavourable. But his eccentric costume, his lean and bony figure, the unnatural pallor of his complexion, and his "visage d'extrême onction," as he calls it, attracted very unpleasant attention from the mob. "My French air," he says, "drew upon me, at every corner of the street, a volley of abusive litanies, in the midst of which I slipped on, thanking my stars that I did not understand English."

M. Grosley was an assiduous attendant at the theatres, where he admired the tragic pieces, but formed a poor opinion of our comedies. His judgment, he tells us, was in both cases due, in Lord Chesterfield's opinion, to ignorance of our language, but this touch of epigrammatic wit should probably be credited to the witty Frenchman himself. At Lord Byron's trial M. Grosley was impressed by the stately ceremonial and the splendour of Westminster Hall, but his attention appears to have been a good deal taken up by the Westminster boys seated on the steps of the throne, munching apples, and throwing the strips of peel into the curls of the Lord High Steward's periwig. Mr. Dobson gives the name of the Lord High Steward as Robert Henley. It was not, however, Lord Henley but the Earl of Northerton who presided at Lord Byron's trial. The intelligent tourist was of course taken to hear the debates in Parliament, and he thought the speeches of the peers better delivered than anything he had heard on our stage. In the Lower House he was not fortunate enough to hear Pitt, and thought little of the eloquence of those members who spoke when he was present. "They stood up," he says, "and addressed them to the Speaker's chair (bureau du Spik), with legs apart, one knee bent, and one arm extended, as if they were going to fence." This description of the position assumed by our parliamentary orators is extremely happy, and it may be added that this ungraceful attitude is still rigidly adhered to by many members of the Commons in our own day. We learn from Mr. Dobson that M. Grosley was surprised "that the pious salutation of any one who sneezed, which still prevailed in his own country, had been abolished in England by the use of snuff. He was given to understand that to salute a snuff-taker in these circumstances was like complimenting him on the colour of the hair of his wig. That colour, by the way, he announces in another place, was usually reddish brown, being chosen as least affected by the mud and dirt of the streets."

Mr. Dobson gathers from this ingenuous explanation that some of M. Grosley's obliging informants must occasionally, in eighteenth century parlance, have treated him to a bite. We do not quite agree with this suggestion. M. Grosley's remarks were more probably inspired by his own sense of humour.

A highly readable vignette in this new series contains a description of Puckle's 'Club,' a dull book in itself, which has, however, provided Mr. Dobson with an opportunity of imparting some amusing gossip to his readers. One witty aphorism quoted here from Puckle, but taken by him, it may be suspected, from some earlier source, is uttered by "Rake," a member of a convivial club assembled at the Noah's Ark. He inveighs against matrimony, which, he declares, men praise as they "do good mustard, with tears in their eyes." Mr. Dobson's own copy of Puckle is the identical little 12mo. deposited on April 29th, 1713, at Lincoln's Inn, where, according to a MS. inscription in the volume, it was "Entered & Registered according to y^e^ Statute." The margins, moreover, are covered with additions and corrections, apparently in Puckle's own handwriting. By consulting various out-of-the-way sources Mr. Dobson has been able to frame quite a connected account of Puckle's career, and has even discovered an advertisement in the Spectator of June 25th, 1712, offering a reward for a pearl necklace lost by him, "in or near" Mr. Edward Smith's house near Uxbridge.

Molly Lepel—the well-known maid of honour, afterwards the wife of Lord Hervey—forms the subject of another vignette. It opens with a capital story of one of the royal coachmen at old Leicester House, who bequeathed 300*l.* to his son on condition that he should never marry a maid of honour. Lady Hervey was one of the most fascinating women of her time. She knew everybody worth knowing, and was liked by everybody whom she knew; but the records of her life are too devoid of episodes to furnish materials for a lively sketch. Mr. Dobson is inaccurate in stating that Pulteney was a visitor at Lady Hervey's house in St. James's Place, both before and after his elevation to the peerage. Pulteney was created Earl of Bath in 1742, and Lady Hervey's name does not appear in the rate-books as occupier of the house for some years after that date. But this is a trifling inaccuracy. A more serious slip, however, occurs in the same vignette, where Mr. Dobson, in alluding to Hampton Court, speaks of it as "Wren's formal palace by the Thames." It is true that Wren rebuilt two of the courts, but what remains of the old building is a fine relic of the great cardinal's magnificence, and one of the best examples extant of the domestic architecture of the early Tudor period.

It is to be hoped that this may not be the last series of 'Eighteenth Century Vignettes,' and when three or four more volumes are published Mr. Dobson would render a service to those interested in the subject if he would issue a general index to the whole work, to serve as a sort of encyclopædia of eighteenth century lore.

The Devil in Britain and America. By John Ashton. (Ward & Downey.)

Although Mr. Ashton presents a formidable list of books, in Latin, French, German, Dutch, and English, "consulted and used in this work," his readers may be inclined to think that in many cases the use and consultation must have been rather perfunctory. The works are supposed to be set forth in order of their publication. At the end of those issued in the sixteenth century we come to "Malleus Maleficarum. De lamiis et strigibus et sagis aliisque Magis & Demoniacis eorumque arte potestate & pœna. 2 tom. Francofurti, 1600. 8vo."—in other words, Sprenger's famous work with the name of the author omitted, and relegated to the last year of the sixteenth century, whereas the Grand Inquisitor of Germany flourished in the fifteenth. This particular edition is, indeed, an amplified reissue of Sprenger's work. He who does not know the date of his 'Malleus Maleficarum' can hardly have a profound acquaintance with the history of demonology and witchcraft. And what is to be thought of a writer on the subject who appends this note to one of his stories? "The writer was the Rev. Joseph Glanville, M.A., F.R.S., Chaplain in Ordinary to King Charles II., Rector of the Abbey Church, Bath, and a Prebendary of Worcester." So much and no more. In truth, Mr. Ashton's book itself makes no profession, or nothing beyond a profession, to knowledge of this wider kind. It is not to be confounded with the philosophical chapters on the subject in Mr. Lecky's 'Rationalism' nor with Michelet's wonderful 'La Sorcière'; not even with Mr. Moncure Conway's book on the devil; for Mr. Ashton's title itself is a little misleading. What the book really is, as readers of the author's other books might expect, is not a history of the belief in Satan, but a highly interesting collection of witch trials and stories of possession in England and America from the sixteenth century downwards, drawn in the majority of cases from pamphlets and chap-books, and illustrated for the most part by reproductions of the small woodblocks with which such chap-books are often adorned. The bibliography at the end is certainly not without value, so far as it is really germane to the matter of the volume; but half a dozen books, such as Olaus Magnus, Bodin, the 'Malleus Maleficarum,' &c., should have been omitted. What, for instance, can be the use of going to the 'Historia de Gentibus Septentriona-libus' (in translation) for an account of the witches in Norway during the Saga era, and making no mention of the many delightful witch stories in the Icelandic Sagas themselves?

"Witchcraft," in the modern sense of the word, is a very different subject for study from "demonology" in its wider acceptation. Mr. Ashton shows a sense of the difference. "At what date," he says, "the higher cult of sorcery or magic became the drivel known as witchcraft is uncertain." But this implies an exaggeration on the other side. There is no date, because there is no clear line of demarcation. Superstitions which are contemptible in the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries have a certain impressiveness and a certain grandeur in the twelfth or thirteenth. But to give not the devil only but his judges their due, the Middle Ages were really not so degradedly superstitious on these matters as the dawn—nay, as the full day—of the Renaissance. Mr. Lecky's well-known history, which to the majority of English readers probably represents the philosophy of witchcraft, is a little misleading upon this point. The writer had a proposition to establish—the steady growth of rationalism out of the belief of mediæval Christianity. It was, too, his first important book, and it was necessary for him to be picturesque. Nobody who has read them can forget the magnificent passages in which the attitude of the mediæval mind towards miracle, and, by implication, towards witchcraft, or, again, the effects of the Black Death and the dawn of scepticism, are described in Mr. Lecky's work. No doubt, to give a rotundity to this proposition and to this picturesque narrative, witchcraft ought to have been extremely prevalent in the Middle Ages. But as a fact the traces of it are far fewer then than in more enlightened ages. It is only at the dawn of the Reformation that enactments against it appear in our statute-books. Mr. Lecky places the culmination of the dread of witchcraft in the fourteenth and fifteenth centuries. The truth is, however, that there is not very much to be learnt about witchcraft, even on the Continent, prior to the publication of Sprenger's book towards the end of the fifteenth century. But, after all, Mr. Lecky has only been following the lines marked out by Michelet. The latter traces the career of the witch throughout the Middle Ages; but his documentary evidence, even for the "Sabbat," is not of the Middle Ages. English witchcraft, for which the documents are comparatively modern, has little to say to this impressive superstition of the Devil's Sabbath, which in origin and character is undoubtedly mediæval.

The trial for witchcraft of Joan of Arc is by far the most memorable process of the kind of which there are any records. Joan was condemned as a heretic, and burnt as a witch. The trial, though at the instance of the English, was conducted at Rouen and according to French law. It therefore does not fall within the scope of Mr. Ashton's book. A short account is given of the trial of Eleanor Cobham, Duchess of Gloucester, which is familiar enough to everybody. Mr. Ashton's witch and devil stories are not arranged in anything approaching to chronological order. The history of the Good Devil of Woodstock, which likewise is familiar to every reader of Scott, appears almost at the beginning of the book. As this is one of the very few which are not, technically speaking, cases of witchcraft, Mr. Ashton probably places it where he does to justify his wide-reaching title; for, of course, the proceedings of "Funny Joe" date from near the end of the heyday of witch trials. Nowadays, as little evidence is required for the commonplace source of extraordinary phenomena as in a more superstitious age sufficed for their supernatural origin; otherwise, as Mr. Andrew Lang not long since pointed out, the story of "Funny Joe"—first presented about a hundred years after the occurrences it was supposed to explain—would not have found such ready acceptance. The great era for witch trials was the end of the fifteenth century and the first half of the sixteenth. James I., as we know, had a special nose for a witch. One wonders if Reginald Scot's courageous and sensible 'Discoverie of Witchcraft' did anything to lessen the zeal of judges and jury, or whether the lot of the "poor, old, lame, fowl and blear eyed women," who, as he says, "are the sort of such as are said to be witches," would have been even worse than it was during that miserable century if he had never written. What a satire upon the whole theory of the covenant with Satan are these sentences of his!—

"These miserable wretches are so odious unto all their neighbours and so feared as few dare offend them or deny them anie thing they aske; whereby they take upon them; yea and some times thinke, that they doo such things as are beyond the abilitie of humane nature. These go from house to house, and from doore to doore for a pot full of milke, yest, drink or pottage or some such releefe; without the which they could hardlie liue: neither obtaining for their seruice and paines nor by their art, nor yet at the diuel's hands (with whom they are said to make a perfect and visible bargaine) either beautie, monie, promotion, welth, worship, pleasure, honor, knowledge, learning or anie other benefit whatsoeuer."

Mr. Ashton refers only incidentally to that infamous scoundrel Matthew Hopkins, the Suffolk witch-finder. And when we come to his American section we find it sadly summary. The celebrated Salem persecution is represented by only part of the report of one trial and by a list of names. These are the last executions for witchcraft among the English-speaking people, and for these America, Samuel Parris, of Salem, Connecticut, and in a less degree Cotton Mather, bear the blame. In this dying flicker of superstition twenty-five persons—mostly women—were hanged, one old woman died in gaol, and one man for refusing to plead was pressed to death.

Mr. Ashton's book cannot be described either as scholarly or exhaustive. Its usefulness as a work of reference is largely diminished by the loose way in which the materials are arranged and the absence of an index. There is no list of illustrations. The frontispiece, 'Facsimile of the only known Specimen of the Devil's Writing,' gives the book a touch of vulgarity. But it is a meritorious compilation; and considered as a book written essentially for the general reader, and the rather indolent one "at that," it is far from unacceptable.

A Calendar of the Inner Temple Records. Edited by F. A. Inderwick, Q.C.—Vol. I. 21 Hen. VII. (1505)–45 Eliz. (1603). (Sotheran & Co.)

THIS volume forms the first of a series to be issued by the Society of the Inner Temple for the purpose of making known to the general public the valuable records preserved in that ancient place of learning. If succeeding volumes are as well edited as this one, and prove to possess equal interest, a hearty welcome is assured to them. Indeed, the interest of further instalments of this work promises to be greater than that which we find here, for Mr. Inderwick has had the most difficult portion of his labour at the outset, many of the earlier records having perished. With much pains and skill he has surmounted all obstacles, and, with the help of many writers, from Chaucer to those of the present day, he has prepared an introduction to this volume which in great measure fills up the gaps just alluded to, and has presented us with the history of the Inner Temple from its earliest days to the close of the reign of Queen Elizabeth.

That "things are not what they seem" may be illustrated by glancing first at the list of Inner Temple records and then by perusing the pages of this volume. Nothing could well be more uninviting and drier than a catalogue of Acts of Parliament, Admission Books, Bar Bonds, Bench Table Orders, Certificate Books, Account Books, and so on, but an examination of these records throws a flood of light on matters of importance, not only to legal students, but to all writers on the ecclesiastical, social, and literary history of our country. The calendar, which forms the body of this volume, has been made, with all his customary carefulness and ability, by Mr. W. Page, F.S.A., and he has also prepared an admirable index and glossary to the work.

The Inner Temple may well be proud of its records, which go further back than those of any of the Inns of Court, Lincoln's Inn only excepted. Several of the earlier records were destroyed in one or other of the numerous fires to which the Temple was subject both before and after the Great Fire of 1666. Wat Tyler and his followers, in 1381, burnt, as Thomas of Walsingham tells us, "many muniments which the lawyers had in their custody." Mr. Inderwick has much to say of the various Inns of Chancery and of the four great Inns of Court. He writes pleasantly of the ancient days when the Society of the Inner Temple held their premises by agreement with the Knights Hospitallers, a state of matters which continued until the dissolution of the latter body in or about 1540, after which date the Society held as tenants at will from the Crown. He describes the various buildings of the Temple—the Church, the Hall, the Chambers; he pictures the garden and the trees, the courts, and the signs over the houses. Shakspeare, in describing the scene between Somerset and Plantagenet in the Temple Garden, refers to the smallness of the Hall in the words which he assigns to Suffolk. Mr. Inderwick discourses on the advance made in legal training at his Inn during the century covered by his volume. The shadowy curriculum of miscellaneous study that Fortescue speaks of had given place to a more definite system, initiated by Queen Mary and regularized by Coke and his immediate predecessors. We have full accounts of the Benchers, Treasurers, Governors, Readers, Auditors, Pensioners, and of the several other officers of the Society. The governing body sat in "Parliaments," and their Acts fill a large number of volumes. These Acts dealt not only, as is generally supposed, with such matters as admissions and calls and the appointment of officers, but with various ecclesiastical and social questions regarding the tenants of the Inner Temple. Of bonds, and deeds, and leases, we read enough, but the picture drawn by Mr. Inderwick has several living personalities, and festivity is by no means absent. Take William Ermested, who was Master of the Temple by deed dated March 2nd, 1542. This ecclesiastic accepted the new Prayer Book under Edward VI., turned round again under Mary Tudor, and made a third change of religion under Elizabeth, dying in 1560, when he was succeeded by Dr. Alvey. Mr. Inderwick gives a very fair summary of the religious ordinances of the period comprised in his book, so far as the Inn was concerned, and where he has been able to complete his cases by drawing on the documents in the Public Record Office, he has wisely filled in his characters. Thus certain members of the Inn were, in 1569, convicted of not resorting to the church at the accustomed times, and of not receiving the communion there. One of them, Robert Atkinson,

"saith that in the vacation times he hath usually gone to the church in the country, and saith he hath not gone so often to church since he hath been a practitioner," an excuse not unknown in the present day. Another member, Thomas Greenwood,

"hath seldom gone to the church by reason of the multitude of causes since he was a practitioner, but he saith his prayers privately in his chamber," which excuse may also apply to modern times. In the records of the Inner Temple Mr. Inderwick has made an interesting discovery. It is that on January 28th, 1581/2, Sir Francis Drake was specially admitted a fellow of the Society "upon a fine at the discretion of the treasurer." Drake had recently returned from his voyage round the world, and his ship, the Golden Hind, was lying in the Thames, an object of universal admiration.

There is much in this volume about the banquets and revels given from time to time in the Temple, and also about the plays there represented. On Twelfth Night of 1560 or 1561 the first dramatic performance of one of the earliest English tragedies, 'Gorboduc,' took place in the Inner Temple Hall. One of its authors was the distinguished jurist Thomas Norton, a Puritan, who had been tutor to the Protector Somerset's children, and had translated into English Calvin's 'Institutions of the Christian Religion.' In 1568 the play of 'Tancred and Gismund' was produced, Elizabeth herself being present. Among the miscellaneous entries in these Inner Temple Records are orders against the wearing of cloaks, hats, &c., in the church, buttery, or hall, under a penalty of 6*s.* 8*d.*; prohibitions against going into the City with hats, boots, and spurs, unless the wearers are riding out of the town; against playing dice or cards in the hall, or elsewhere in the house, under pain of fine and expulsion; against "shooters with guns" within the Inn; against disclosing the secrets of the Parliament; against coming into the hall with any weapon, except the dagger and the knife, under penalty of 5*l.*; an order that no married man should be eligible as a butler of the Society, and that, if a butler married after appointment, he should lose his post; an order regulating the allowance of beef and beer to the gardener, and ordering "all broken bread and drink with the chippings" to be distributed among the poor; and numerous others.

Enough has been said to show that, while describing the studies and life of the students and lawyers of the Inner Temple, these records are of interest to others besides members of the compiler's profession. We can cordially commend his volume (for the printing and binding of which a word of admiration must not be omitted), and we shall look forward to the due arrival of its successors.

Introduction to the History of Religion. By F. B. Jevons, M.A. (Methuen & Co.)

Writers of "introductions" to scientific subjects are usually expected to supply milk for babes. Mr. Jevons's 'Introduction to the History of Religion' is by no means "very popular milk"; on the other hand, it is uncommonly strong meat. Mr. Jevons belongs to the anthropological school, and leaves aside the speculations, for example, of Prof. Max Müller. He has not even very much to say about Mr. E. B. Tylor, but is a follower of Prof. Robertson Smith and Mr. Frazer, who again proceed directly from Mr. McLennan, though they are both more learned and more critical than that brilliant pioneer. As to Mr. Herbert Spencer, Mr. Jevons reverses his theory that ancestor worship is the origin of religion:—

"The notion that gods were evolved out of ghosts is based on an unproved assumption..... The fact is that ancestors known to be human were not worshipped as gods, and that ancestors worshipped as gods were not believed to have been human."

Mr. Jevons begins with the "calling forth of the belief in supernatural power"—its "calling forth," not its creation—by the violation of "laws on which man could count, and sequences which he habitually initiated and controlled." Such events seemed to him "supernatural," caused by "a mysterious power." With that power man, to serve his private ends, would try to enter into friendly relations, regarding the power as exercised by "a spirit having affinity to his own." All things were, of course, animated to the mind of this early thinker, but were not necessarily "supernatural." "The spirits were not in themselves supernatural spirits," and only became so when man believed them to exercise "supernatural power." He would endeavour to locate the power, and did so in animals, or in a common ancestor of his and of a given species of animal. When he tried to control and direct the power, as by sympathetic magic, he was doing something, in his opinion, rather scientific than supernatural. Thus you put sharp stones in an enemy's foot-tracks for the purpose of laming him by sympathy. That is, in your state of knowledge, as scientific, and as little supernatural, as if you gave your enemy a dose of arsenic. Thus magic is not the root of religion, for religion is offended by the assumptions of the sorcerer. Yet, as in Chaldæa and in the very mixed faith of Iamblichus, religion and magic may find a modus vivendi.

Mr. Jevons next asks how man conceived of the environing personalities, not himself. He follows Mr. Tylor's theory of dreams as the source of the savage's mental picture of his own spirit. The spirit is detachable in dream, trance, and death; it may return from the grave, and receives a friendly welcome if it does so. That welcome (which is not worship) is extended to "supernatural spirits," and then is worship. That worship is again transferred to natural spirits of the ancestral dead.

Mr. Jevons now turns to taboo, which, he says, is not derived from fear of evil spirits. He derives it, oddly enough, from a feeling that "some things must never be done," and this feeling is a "'primitive' sentiment, a tendency inherent in the mind of man.... it is prior to, and even contradictory of, experience." "The sentiment is neither exclusively moral, religious, nor social." Against this opinion the arguments are obvious. Let us take a case or two. "You must not eat poison berries," that is a prohibition, not a taboo. But "you must not hear the crying of the wild fowl on the Loch of Tara" (if you are an Irish king), that is a taboo. Why must you not? Nobody knows; but we cannot say that such senseless prohibitions are devoid of a (supposed) experimental foundation. Perhaps once a king was unlucky when the fowls were crying on the loch. Therefore—post hoc et ergo propter hoc—no king must run the risk again. Probably all taboos are based on a supposed experience, or (as many are) on some real though remote or unavowable practical reason. The reason in the case of not eating poison berries is obvious, capable of being tested, and so needs no "supernatural" sanction, or taboo. But when the prohibition was originally based on a supposed experience, on a fantastic theory, incapable of test, or was not convenient to be divulged, then the supernatural sanction of taboo was called in.

This theory of taboos we prefer to a mystic à priori "tendency inherent in the mind of man." However, taboo, bringing contagious punishment, interested all the community in its preservation, and produced "the conception of social obligation." The time came when the mechanical, inevitable, contagious action of taboo was taken up into religion, and regarded as the prohibition of a god who had a reason for his negative command. The more religion advanced, the more rational became the god, and, in proportion, the irrational taboos died out under the influence of individual religious reformers, till only rational and moral prohibitions remained in force (as taboos) by a process of "supernatural selection."

Mr. Jevons now turns to totemism as the first effort made by man to establish friendly society with supernatural forces. Man had no associations except with blood kin or persons adopted into the blood kin by the blood covenant. He conceived that all other animated things, that is, everything, existed in societies similar to his own. He had blood feuds with beasts, and he also made covenants with species of beasts and plants. These species were of his totem and he of theirs. He and his totem had a common ancestor. He may not kill or eat his totem, and now at last, in the totem, "he has gained the supernatural ally he sought." But why should he think a bear or crane supernatural at all, especially if he adopted the attitude of the Psychical Society (as he did, ex hypothesi), regarding his uncle's ghost as perfectly "natural," and no more "supernatural" than his living aunt? How does the friendly bear, quite natural, become the "totem god" or "clan god," who is supernatural? Why is "a species of natural objects conceived of as superhuman"? Apparently Mr. Jevons thinks that the common ancestor (a bear) of all bears and men of the bear totem is deified somehow and is the desired "supernatural ally." It may be our stupidity, but we cannot follow the argument nor see where or how "the supernatural" comes in.

We found man impressed with a sense of the supernatural by "the cussedness of things." We found him trying to "locate" the power which works unlooked-for phenomena. He knew of spirits galore, and regarded all things as animated, but he did not "locate" the mysterious power in spirits. He made alliance with a species of animals, and "located" the supernatural in his and their common ancestor—perhaps a lobster, and this ancestral lobster evolved into a totem god. Now, when you have once got a totem god you can anthropomorphize him, and then deanthropomorphize him, and so forth, till you have a spiritual god. But we do not accept, or even understand, Mr. Jevons's theory of how this totem god was arrived at and regarded as "supernatural."

Space does not permit us to follow the survivals of totemism, the doctrine (much like Robertson Smith's) of sacrifice, the essays on the mysteries and fetishism, and the conclusion. From this we learn that early man "sought to reconcile his internal and external experience by identifying the personal divine will, which manifested itself to his inner consciousness, with one of the personal agents in the external world that exercised an influence on his fortunes," and these agents he supposed to be animals, hence totems. This is rather hazy. Again, Mr. Jevons writes, "In the stage of totemism the clan has but one totem, one tribal god," which is a fallacy. In each local group or tribe, socially united, and making up a clan, there are several totems; hence it is most unlikely that such a community cherished one animal all over their range of country, and thus, as Mr. Jevons supposes, introduced the domestication of animals. His book contains many ingenious aperçus, but for an introduction it is too involved, and in our opinion too fantastic, while the logic in several places is either not clear or not convincing. For an introduction also it is too advanced, and in its theory does not seem sufficiently coherent or adequately bottomed on facts.

But, though the volume appears rather to miss its mark as an introduction, as an essay on comparative religion it is a work which no student can afford to neglect. The author is no blind follower of any master, and differs often from Mr. Frazer. The chapters on "Monotheism" and "The Evolution of Belief" are excellent in tone and spirit, suggest ideas new to many confident prattlers, and are far removed from the old reproach against the irreverence of anthropology.

NEW NOVELS.

The Betrayal of John Fordham. By B. L. Farjeon. (Hutchinson & Co.)

TWO-THIRDS of Mr. Farjeon's book is a lurid temperance tract. John Fordham is betrayed into marriage with a confirmed dipsomaniac, and the rivalry and interested hatred of his stepmother and half-brother induce them to take the part of the terrible wife, and to misrepresent the frequent scenes of noise and riot to the husband's disadvantage. So far there is little characterization, the principal impression made being that of the extreme weakness of the husband's conduct in face of so obvious a conspiracy. The other third is a very readable detective story. A good deal of skill is expended on the murder in the lonely house at Liverpool. And so complicated are the circumstances surrounding it that it is not till the last lines of the last chapter that we are enabled, by the aid of a model detective, to trace the guilt of the crime to its proper authors. The revelations of Jack Skinner, couched in a dialect savouring strongly of shilling tickets to Kempton Park, and the self-betrayal of Madame Loubert through the comic scene in Soho, are the "pick of the basket" in a literary sense. The position of Ellen Cameron, "a woman who did," will be variously estimated. On the whole, if the earlier and polemic portion had been obliterated, Mr. Farjeon might have been congratulated on a success in his original manner.

The Home for Failures. By Lady Violet Greville. (Hutchinson & Co.)

IF Lady Violet Greville intended, as we must suppose, to write a tragedy, she should have chosen some other title than one which inevitably conveys the idea of extravaganza. Neither do the opening chapters, which are sufficiently absurd, though without being amusing, prepare us for the melancholy conclusion of the story. It must, however, be admitted that Oriza, at all events, takes herself seriously when she offers her house and her society to a miscellaneous collection of men and women scarcely more restless and discontented with life than is their hostess. The results of this preposterous scheme show a certain insight into a section of humanity that is morbidly introspective and entirely devoid of humour; but the author has neither the style nor the experience to cope with such a difficult subject, and the "failures" are for the most part unattractive and uninteresting. The Hon. Rachel Cator, whose good sense has unhappily so little influence upon her friend, is the one person in the book with any claim to vitality. We should have been glad to hear more of her and less of her "bike," which latter is fast becoming a tiresome intrusion in a class of fiction that aspires above all to be modern.

The Red Scaur: a Novel of Manners. By P. Anderson Graham. (Longmans & Co.)

THIS is an old-fashioned leisurely story which will afford small satisfaction to the reader who approaches it in a hasty and inconsiderate spirit. The "manners" referred to are those of a remote village in Northumberland some fifty and more years ago, and the perpetual digressions to pictures of local customs and individuals can be the readier forgiven in one who has such an intimate love and knowledge of country life, and such a charming manner of portraying it, as Mr. Graham. The reader who has any sympathy with the subject can hardly fail to hear the rush of the Skelter, or to feel the fresh air from the Cheviots on his face, any more than he can withhold his affections from old John Harbottle, the honest shepherd of the burn, or even from the reprobate Billy White. But he will have to wade through long-winded chapters concerning persons of a previous generation, and follow the corrupt ascent of Adam Harbottle from hind to farmer, before he is allowed to proceed to the main plot and the main persons. These, when reached, with pretty Lil and her lovers (of whom the narrator is one) as central figures, provide some very stirring incidents; but owing to the absence of concentration, or rather to the author's overmastering passion for his own subject, the general impression left by the book is one of a series of delightful open-air scenes rather than that of a connected story.

Gods of Gold. By Mrs. Aylmer Gowing. (White & Co.)

WE will do Mrs. Aylmer Gowing the justice to suppose that she meant to give her story a highly moral tone. This, however, has not debarred her from letting her readers into some astonishing secrets, from the dressing-room of the American heiress to the vestry of the Anglican priest, and in the latter case these do not edify as they were obviously intended to do. When "Society's Belle, the peerless Ruby Lynndale," is jilted by her aristocratic lover in favour of Yankee money-bags, she puts on a black dress, and, at "Godma's" advice, flies from her creditors to the long-suffering poor in the East-End. Here, as was easily foreseen, she falls in love with a young priest of saint-like appearance and ritualistic views. How her affection is reciprocated, and how the poor young man flies, like his predecessors in history, to escape the temptress in the desert, his shocking end, and the melodramatic proceedings of the sometime beauty, we leave the author to tell in language which is quite sufficiently florid to do justice to such matters.

A Venetian Love Story. By Blanche Loftus Tottenham. (Osgood, McIlvaine & Co.)

THE theme of the young woman who is engaged to one man, and on his removal—whether accidentally or in the course of his vocation—to a distance, goes and marries another, has done duty in fiction to an extent hardly justified by the frequency with which the case occurs in real life. The more embarrassing variety in which the inconstant lady is actually the wife of the missing man is probably far more often met with, but is certainly less popular with novelists. Miss Tottenham tells the old tale once more, largely, it would seem, as an excuse for descriptions of Venice, in which city, we may presume, she has recently made some stay. So have others, and some of them have also described it. The practice is a snare. It may please the writer, but it bores the reader, and in the present case rather predisposes him to take a less favourable view of the story than it deserves. When he finds the walls of Burano shimmering twice in one chapter, and the tower of old Torcello standing lonely and dark against the shadowy blue outlines of the Alps, when the golden light of the afternoon was deepening over the lagunes, he is inclined to think that Mr. Ruskin has done all this once for all, and to turn to something fresh. Really, however, the story is well told, and if it could be compressed into one-third of the space it now occupies, by the excision of Torcello, Burano, and other accessories, it would doubtless be popular. Of course, it suffers from the objection to which most studies on the same theme are open—that the second man is in every respect, save mere physical development, the superior of his unlucky predecessor in the lady's affections; and the reader is consequently apt to condone the infidelity in consideration of the wisdom shown by the fickle damsel in getting out of a bad bargain. The author, we suspect, feels this, and therefore thinks it necessary to counteract any sympathies by insisting on her heroine's less amiable qualities, though until the catastrophe arrives, nothing that she tells us of her is inconsistent with the career of a well-conducted young person enough. Hence a want of "convincingness" which rather takes the edge off the tragedy.

A Lonely Girl. By Mrs. Hungerford. (Downey & Co.)

The author of this story is, we fear, past repentance, or we would urge her to consider how much her often touching love stories lose by the rough clowning which passes for wit among her young men and maidens. In the present case we have a party assembled at an Irish country house, and besides the horse-play, which we believe is considered humorous in circles which aim at high fashion, there is the clumsy joker who never would be missed, but whom we never fail to meet in Mrs. Hungerford's pages. In the present case he is called Owen Magrath, and his banjo, his jests, and himself are equally intolerable. We also have the loud, fat Irish matron, whose personal defects are insisted on as suggestive of mirth. Here she is called Madam O'Flaherty, and is as vulgar as usual. On the other hand, the "lonely girl" herself is all that is desirable, and the lover who, more by luck than good guidance, relieves her solitary state, is a passable jeune premier. Sir Lucien, the wicked uncle, is too unmitigated in his avarice and tyranny.

A Proctor's Wooing. By Alan St. Aubyn. (White & Co.)

'A Proctor's Wooing' is another of Alan St. Aubyn's fictions of university life, and it shows all the qualities and defects of its precursors. The author is more original in some of his (or her) statements in respect of Cambridge manners and customs, and in certain points of English syntax, than in devising names for the characters of the story, some of which are taken in full from living persons not unknown to fame. As for the originality of statement and implication, we learn for the first time that young women at Newnham are undergraduates, and that they expect degrees—as of course they would if they were really undergraduates. We hear of frequent visits made by men to Newnham and women to St. Crispin's, of a duel with pistols between undergraduates, and of other things which would have been exceedingly improbable, if not absolutely impossible, at any rate in the undergraduate days of the present writer. Clearly the author would not be ill advised in selecting a different set of surroundings and characteristics, in which slight errors of detail might be less conspicuous, wherewith to eke out a very respectable talent for romance.

Stella's Story. By Darley Dale. (Virtue & Co.)

It is not every young lady whose lover, having married some one else from motives of duty, finds himself within a few months enabled, owing to a colliery explosion, to return to her and resume with a more fortunate result the relations temporarily interrupted by his aberration into the paths of self-sacrifice. On the other hand, it may be said that not every young man owns a colliery where matters are conducted in the casual fashion that seems to have prevailed in Mr. Paul Benson's pit. "Lying on their backs in all directions," we read, "were a number of almost naked men; in their caps they wore lighted candles." Setting aside the physical difficulty of wearing a lighted candle in your cap when you are lying on your back, we may observe that, with this easygoing use of naked lights at the "face," the accident which terminated the short married life of the first Mrs. Benson was bound to occur early and often, and further that somebody would hardly in real life have escaped a trial for manslaughter. Before "Darley Dale" makes another story turn on the chances of coal-mining, she had better ascertain a little more about the way in which that industry is carried on. In the presence of such a monstrous bit of carelessness as that we have pointed out, it is hardly worth while to remark that there are no such places in Venice as the "Riva de Schiavone" or the "Scuola di San Rocca," and that the student of architecture does not look for the "Early English" style in France. Otherwise the book is commonplace, and the business of the twin sisters and their lovers is occasionally a trifle vulgar.

TWO BOOKS ABOUT JAPAN.

The Hermit Princes: a Tale of Adventure in Japan, by Eleanor Stredder (Nelson & Sons), is a confused story, or rather a series of scenes in which an English boy wrecked upon the coast of Ainuland; a ci-devant Daimio, rejoicing in the extraordinary title or name Go-Inkyo, who manages to keep up his train of "yaconins" and much of his former state under the new régime; and a variety of anachronistic Japanese, play their several parts. The adventures are anything but thrilling, and the local colour and properties are taken from current books on Japan, which accounts for their being about as real as the trappings of Gilbert and Sullivan's 'Mikado.' To those who know something of Japan such names as "Ottena," "O Ginka San," and "Archikaga," such expressions as "nam honto," mistakes like "Jesu Sama" for Jizō Sama, and the strange reproduction of the alphabet-quatrain "Iroha," &c., on p. 252, will sufficiently indicate the competence of the author to execute the task she has undertaken.

Sunrise Stories, by Roger Riordan and T. Takayanagi (Kegan Paul & Co.), is a book of a very different order from 'The Hermit Princes.' The score of tales and sketches of which it consists, though inferior from a literary point of view to Mr. Mitford's charming 'Tales of Old Japan,' are more interesting in that they convey a much more adequate notion of Japanese legend and fiction than was possible twenty years ago. Some of the prettier myths are shortly narrated; examples are given of the style and substance of the mediæval monogatari; portions of the well-known Tosa Nikki (Tosa Journal) are condensed; of the universally popular 'Chiushingura' the outline is told; and of one of the best, perhaps (but not the very best), of the novels of Bakin—"the Japanese Scott"—a brief epitome is presented. The best of these stories are undoubtedly the 'Chiushingura,' or 'Loyal League,' long since translated by Mr. Dickins, and Mistress Añ's half-regretful narrative, told in early Tokugawa days, of the bloody times of her youth, when the great Gongensama extinguished the rivalry of the feudal barons and closed the long struggle that began with the wars between Satsuma and Hideyoshi, to end in the supremacy of the Tokugawa house that was to endure for nearly two centuries and a half, itself to cease with the re-enthronement of the Mikado, heralded by the cannon of Commodore Perry. But more interesting still than the stories, which, despite a certain quaintness of conception, are equally wanting in point, humour, pathos, or skill in narration—to tell the truth, Japanese literature, with rare exceptions, is insufferably dull and prolix—are Mr. Takayanagi's own recollections of the last years of old Japan, with which the volume closes. "Each day," to make one quotation,

"awakened by the noise of a universal clapping of hands—the entire population of the city greeting the morning sun—he [the present writer, Mr. Takayanagi] has risen to an early breakfast of tea and salt prunes, intended more as a sort of sacrament to purify the soul than as food to nourish the body. After the daily hot bath and worship at the household shrine of Buddha came a more substantial meal of bean soup, boiled rice, and pickled radishes [the famous daikon, of which the odour, Miss Bird tells us, has made many a brave man flee]; and then the walk to school through the walled Samurai quarter, a belt of cultivated ground and scattered dwellings drawn close around the castle, and itself enclosed on all sides by the multitudinous roofs of the city. Each house stood in its own rice-fields and vegetable gardens, irrigated by channels drawn from the river, which here came out to the light after a subterranean course through the lower town [Saga in Hizen]. The stream circled through the castle moat, gay in summer with the huge pink blossoms of the lotus, and passed out again in darkness, running under crowded streets and close-packed houses. The citizens were required to show their wooden pass-tickets at the gates before they were permitted to enter the castle precincts. At school we were taught to read and write Chinese as well as Japanese, and on cold winter nights, in a big annex to the school building, we practised fencing with bamboo swords and wooden spears, and also wrestling in the Japanese manner, calculated to give strength and suppleness to every portion of the body. In summer we had games of polo, and were taught to shoot with bow and arrow from horseback. In fact, we were trained as though we were still in the Middle Ages."

It is to be regretted that Mr. Takayanagi repeats the stupid libel on the murdered Englishman Richardson, whom he charges with the incredibly silly exploit of "spurring his horse in a spirit of bravado [though accompanied by a lady] into the ranks of a [Daimio's] procession" numbering some thousands of retainers. The absolute groundlessness of this accusation is sufficiently shown in the despatches of the period, and more recently in the 'Life of Sir Harry Parkes.' The authors, who see in Japan a country that comes as near as possible in this imperfect world to the ideal condition of altruism, regard its literature as one of form without much substance. Korea, China, and Formosa may have something to say to the former assertion; with the latter we agree, but the form is "common form." Of Lieut. Dickens's translation of the 'Taketori Monogatari' we have not heard. We have seen one by Mr. Dickins, who translated the 'Chiushingura.' The versions given of some of the curious prefaces to the 'Fugaku Hyakkei' ('Hundred Views of Fuji') seem to have been taken from the translation of Hokusai's celebrated work published some years ago, with some alterations, but no acknowledgment — a proceeding not out of keeping with the American origin of the book before us.

BOOKS FOR THE YOUNG.

Flix and Flox, by Mrs. Heathcote Statham (Blackie & Son), is a pretty tale of a tiny brother and sister who, in their beautiful Cornish home, learned to think for others and to do what they could for the little children pent up in the slums of great cities. 'Flix and Flox' is a very small book, but it is all good, and, moreover, it is attractive.—Miss E. Everett-Green in Squib and his Friends (Nelson & Sons) furnishes a delightful glimpse into child life. Squib, "the odd one" in his family, is not an ordinary lad. He is one who thinks and has the power of expressing his thoughts. He is a brave and engaging little fellow, and attracts to him friends worth having, and the story of his doings with his friends is worth reading.

When readers hear that Every Inch a Sailor (Nelson & Sons) is from the pen of Dr. Gordon Stables, they will know what to expect. Frederick Augustus Norval Gay is as frank and as brave and as capable as all the Doctor's heroes, and his adventures are every whit as marvellous as those over which boys are accustomed to pore. When they first make Fred's acquaintance he is a lad of twelve, living in a beautiful and luxurious home; but the spell of the sea is on him, and he breaks away.—For Duty's Sake (Jarrold & Sons) is a collection of "stirring stories of noble lives" told by Miss Mary Douglas, who begins the tale with that "friend of the friendless," Lord Shaftesbury, harks back to Nelson, Sir John Franklin, and John Howard, and gives also the strange and wonderful stories of Sister Dora and of Father Damien.

The "Fifty-two Library" is growing apace. Some of its volumes are excellent, others not so good. Fifty-two Stories of Pluck, Peril, and Romance for Girls (Hutchinson & Co.) must fall, we are afraid, into the second class. Some of the tales are interesting enough, but many of them are trivial and hardly worth telling.—L. T. Meade is certainly more successful when she deals with children than when she attempts to grapple with that very difficult creature the grown-up girl. A Little Mother to the Others (White & Co.) is the history of four fascinating little mortals, who surely have not merited their cruel fate. Their mother dies, their father goes off to the Himalayas, and they are left to the care of a well-meaning, but hard-hearted aunt, from whom they are stolen by gipsies, and then sold to circus folk. In spite of all these woes the book is quite charming, and will certainly be attractive to those who care for children, if not to the children themselves.—Merry Girls of England, by the same author (Cassell & Co.), is of quite a different type. The girl heroines — who, by the way, are not particularly merry—being bereft of their parents and guardians, seek in divers ways to maintain themselves. The best of them take to farming, but the least interesting goes to London to write for a livelihood. We hear a good deal more of her than of her country sisters, and what we hear we do not much like. There is a good deal of mysterious and involved family history in 'Merry Girls of England'; the mystery has nothing to do with the literary Barbara and her farm sisters. Altogether the story does not hang together too perfectly, and we much prefer the tale of the stolen children with all its cares and sorrows.

Every Girl's Book, edited by Mrs. M. Whitley (Routledge), is a most useful and attractive volume, containing information and advice from writers altogether competent to instruct and advise on "all matters connected with girlish sports, occupations, and pastimes." There are articles on gardening, on golf, on cycling—the last from the pen of Miss Lillias Campbell Davidson, the President of the Ladies' Cycling Association—and on all the other outdoor occupations and amusements which are dear to girls. Lady John Hay, who writes from practical experience, gives many excellent hints as to poultry rearing and dairy farming—two delightful occupations, which can be developed into paying professions. Home studies and many forms of indoor occupation and amusement occupy due space. Mrs. Conyers Morrell, an acknowledged authority on needlework, has revised and enlarged the section devoted to that all-important subject. The Duchess of Teck gives a most interesting account of "The Needlework Guild," of which she is president; and Lady Jeune, who knows more than most of us of the modern training of girls, and has, moreover, the gift of bright and clear exposition, contributes some valuable articles on home studies, on the duties of girls in the way of district visiting, teaching poor children, and helping to bring brightness into the lives of others less happily situated than themselves. 'Every Girl's Book,' in its present form, ought to be widely known and studied.

The reader is introduced to many of the personages in The Zankiwank and the Bletherwitch, by S. J. Adair (Dent & Co.), at Charing Cross Station, whither they have rushed to catch the train for Fableland—a very clever illustration shows some of them in the act. Such a set of passengers were never seen, and well might Willie and Maud think that they themselves were dreaming. They sing, they dance, they rhyme, and make fun all through the book, with a bewildering effect—the whole book, indeed, instead of one part, might have been entitled 'Topsy Turvey Land.' It is full of gaiety and cleverness, and yet when we shut it we feel that "the indicative mood has been disturbed." To understand this allusion the book must be read, and somehow we cannot help thinking we have seen the volume before. Many of the "pictures" by Mr. Arthur Rackham are good and amusing.

SCOTTISH STORIES.

Kate Carnegie, and those Ministers. By Ian Maclaren. (Hodder & Stoughton.)—Dr. Watson's new book should be read by all Southrons who care to become acquainted with the inmost recesses of Scotch character of the better sort. Some of the personages who contribute to the life of these sketches and serve to consolidate the several scenes into a connected story are of our old acquaintance. The saintly Marget and her inappreciative husband, Drumsheugh, Burnbrae, Hillocks, and Jamie Soutar are all members of the society we wot of. Only the brave doctor seems missing from the familiar company. But his place is occupied by the striking figure of "Rabbi" Saunderson, a single-hearted Calvinist saint, who, if any one, combines the love of man with the most slavish dread of God. Beyond and beneath his superficial eccentricities—his unexhausted appetite for books, his indifference and absence of mind about domestic trifles, his indiscriminate charity, his habit of turning his back to the wind for the convenience of taking snuff, and then pursuing the direction in which he finds his face—there is suggested a spiritual conflict, of which the pure soul and attenuated frame of the Rabbi are the proper theatre. It is characteristic of our author's graver mood. The ways of the Presbytery and its clerk; the deft formalism with which they minimize the presentment of John Carmichael for heresy which has caused the Rabbi so many a pang, and indirectly costs him his life; the admirable description of the "occasion," or ministration of the sacrament; the humours of beadles and the housekeepers of bachelor ministers — all these are the fruit of considerable observation, and in suitable instances abound in quiet humour. Excellent, too, is the account — founded, as the present writer well remembers, on sad fact—of the Glasgow Bank convulsion, a catastrophe foreseen by Dr. Davidson's beadle, horrified at the notion that his master has gone "fey." ("The best o's tempts Providence at a time, and when a man like the Doctor tries to rin aifter his dog, jidgment canna be far off.") Many readers will still more appreciate the description of Perth station in August, and of the commanding tactician who brings order out of the confusion of the trains. We know not whether the author is aware of that functionary's wrath on one of such occasions, when a malicious traveller got the train stopped as it was quitting the platform, only to inquire sweetly, "Is this Joppie?"—a comparison of deadly insolence. For one of his good things, the absolution of the claret "after three several appearances," Dr. Watson should have acknowledged his obligation to Dean Ramsay. We have left ourselves no space to deal with the story; but, indeed, it is of the slightest. We note in Janet and Donald an aptitude for the appreciation of Highland character not very common in Scotch novelists, and, on the whole, can honestly welcome a many-sided, if rather heterogeneous collection of sketches by one who knows his countrymen.

George Umber, the author of Ayrshire Idylls of other Days (A. Gardner), is, as he says, a sentimentalist. It is also clear that he is a lover of our eighteenth century classics, and that he has acquired certain mannerisms from Charles Lamb. Apart from this, the even flow of reflection and reminiscence, neither striking nor profound, will attract few readers, although for persons completely ignorant of Scotland such chapters as 'The Old Pew,' 'Between the Preachings,' &c., may possess something of novelty. It may be conceded that the author's descriptive style is fluent, and that the illustrations of Mr. William Findlay are passable. There is no excess of vernacular Scotch in the book, and not a grain of humour.

The title of Mr. David Lyall's collection of religious stories, The Land of the Leal (Hodder & Stoughton), is probably used in its proper sense, not that unaccountably adopted by Mr. Gladstone. But the series, which is strung together loosely through the personality of 'Lisbeth Gray, the pious wife of "Staneriggs" the farmer, has to do with Scotland, and more particularly with South-Country farmers, miners, and "merchants." It cannot be said that the book is particularly exciting or shows a great deal of literary power. But some of the tales are pathetic, notably that entitled 'One of the Weak Things of the World,' which might, the sardonic will say, have been the title of the book. There is not any great extravagance in vernacular spelling or diction, though the author's own narrative is amusingly full of Scotticisms. On the whole, the work should be popular in religious circles.

BIBLIOGRAPHY.

Bibliographica. Parts VII. and VIII. (Kegan Paul & Co.)—In the two parts of Bibliographica, which complete the second volume of this sumptuous publication, the embellishment of both the interiors and the exteriors of books occupies the greater portion of the space. Half of the twelve articles to be found in the numbers deal solely with the beautifying of the book, the remainder with the making of the book, special books, and book-publishing. Those beautiful productions of the Venetian craftsmen of the late fifteenth and early sixteenth century, the "Ducali," form the subject of an excellent article by Mr. J. W. Bradley, who points at the outset to the singular fact that at this period there is an almost entire cessation in the production of the sumptuous liturgical manuscripts which were so marked a feature of the immediately preceding age. This was not due to the absence of qualified craftsmen, but, it would seem, to a lack of interest at the moment in the production of such works, and perhaps to a slight accession of austerity. More probably still, however, it may be attributed to an increased civic activity, for we find that a company of craftsmen was formed whose work and pride it was, as impressors, stampadors, and miniators, to produce exquisite specimens of the book-making art. To the zest kindled by the inauguration of such a guild we most likely owe the production of the "Ducali," which Mr. Bradley classifies under four heads: "Promissioni," i. e., the oaths taken by the Doges; "Comissioni," the diplomas granted by them; "Capitolari," statutory commissions; and "Mariegole," statutes and regulations of the various orders and guilds of the province. The number of these documents was naturally considerable, and specimens have gradually found their way into various great libraries of Europe. Some idea of their character may be obtained from the illustrations given, which indicate a rare faculty for beauty of design.

Although the decoration of religious books in Venice during the period referred to was somewhat in abeyance, such work had been prosecuted with great energy only a few years before. This activity is much in evidence in the article on 'The Grotesque and Humorous in the Illuminations of the Middle Ages,' by Sir E. Maunde Thompson. He accounts for the anachronism which is so patent in these productions by assuming that the illuminations had little relevancy to the matter of the manuscripts, and were in no sense illustrations of the text. He assumes that such ornament was merely a matter of tradition; and the recurrence, in manuscripts of different schools, of varieties of ornamentation distinctive of each school, all agreeing in their irrelevancy, seems sufficient proof that the assumption is correct. The illustrations of this important article are well selected. One cannot but be struck with the Japanese or Chinese aspect of some of these grotesques, that on p. 313 being the most notable instance.

Mr. R. K. Douglas deals with 'Chinese Illustrated Books' in a way which leaves the reader somewhat undecided whether Chinese or Japanese artists are the better. The examples which he selects do not certainly suggest a very exalted opinion of the former, and, although they belong to different periods, exhibit universally the crudeness without beauty of line which, in this department at any rate, puts the Chinese sadly behind most other nations of whose art in book production anything is known.

Of a curious and intricate subject Mr. A. W. Pollard furnishes an excellent account in his article on 'The Transference of Woodcuts in the Fifteenth and Sixteenth Centuries.' It has been found that some of the illustrations of books printed in France, Germany, and Italy are also to be found in books printed in England, and the question as to the method of procedure is interesting enough to spur on the investigator to fresh efforts with every new find. Such transferences may have been made in various ways: woodcuts may have been bought, borrowed, or stolen, and undoubtedly each of these three methods was adopted in various cases. In borrowing or buying, the original block or a replica of it, either in wood or soft metal, would be transferred; but in the stealing, or, as copyright was in those days an unknown quantity, we should, perhaps, say the appropriation process, the design only was used, either entirely or in part, as the basis of a new picture, varying more or less in detail. A whole series of such variations has been traced by Mr. Pollard, and one of the commonest and most readily observed appropriations occurs in the frequent renewals of designs, where the right side becomes the left and contrariwise. Such reversals were made in two ways: either by the copyist transferring the design to his block by pasting it on and cutting through the impression, or by his simply copying it more or less closely from the print, and then cutting in the usual way. Many amusing instances of his researches are given by the author of this fruitful paper.

The exterior ornamentation of books is dealt with in an article on 'The Decoration of Book Edges,' in which Mr. Cyril Davenport gives us a sketch of this form of craft work from its inception in the fourteenth century. Discarding the theory that the original germ of such decoration is to be found in the practice sometimes adopted of inscribing the title on the edges instead of the binding, when it was customary for books to lie on their sides, Mr. Davenport traces it back to the period when Byzantine influence in European art was still potent. Such decoration resolves itself into three divisions: in the first the edges were either left plain or painted a natural colour, upon which the design was drawn; the second, in which the edges were gilded and then worked upon with binders' tools, towards the end of the sixteenth century, entirely superseded the first class; and the third, originating in the latter half of the seventeenth, reappears about the close of the eighteenth century in England. This last class, which is the most elaborate, consists of paintings of portraits, landscapes, and conventional and heraldic designs, which are generally only visible when the leaves of the book are sloped. Examples of each of these classes are described, and the descriptions illustrated with some beautiful colour reproductions.

In 'The Book-plates of J. Skinner of Bath,' Mr. W. J. Hardy provides lovers of ex-libris with a subject deserving even closer study than he has himself been able at present to give to it. He has discovered a few more particulars than those given by Lord de Tabley, but even now the information about this excellent designer and friend of Gainsborough is but scanty. The high character of his work may be well seen in the numerous reproductions of book-plates from his hand which accompany the article.

Two special books are dealt with in these numbers in 'Notes on the Latin Bible of Forty-two Lines, 1455,' by Mr. Russell Martineau, and 'Puckle's Club,' by Mr. Austin Dobson. The former is a careful collation of a considerable number of copies of the Mainz Bible ascribed to Gutenberg, the results of which are somewhat remarkable, not to say confusing, although treated by Mr. Martineau in as luminous a manner as was possible where so much that seems unmeaning has to be accounted for. Mr. Austin Dobson writes charmingly of James Puckle, notary, inventor, speculator, and author, who in 1711 issued 'The Club; or, a Dialogue between Father and Son.' As we have spoken of him in noticing 'Eighteenth Century Vignettes' in another column, we need only here mention the biographical details. 'The Club' itself, with its sub-title 'A Grey Cap for a Green Head,' as it first appeared in the edition of 1723, is bibliographically described and critically appraised. In both aspects it has a very considerable interest, for it ran through several editions, one of which was of the most sumptuous character, and its moral maxims are by no means inelegantly expressed or devoid of that humour which is the most effective ally of morality.

The history of printing is further elucidated by part iii. of Mr. W. H. Allnutt's 'English Provincial Presses,' in which he treats of the private press of Sir Henry Savile at Eton; the King's Printer at Newcastle-on-Tyne in 1639; and the presses of the Civil War and the Revolution. To the description of these is added a valuable chronology of the provincial presses from the end of the seventeenth century to the close of the first half of the eighteenth. Mr. Henry R. Plomer deals with 'John Rastell and his Contemporaries' in an article rendered possible by his discovery at the Record Office of an important document relating to the famous printing-house the "Mermaid next Paul's Gate." This find, which belongs to the years 1534–5, enables him to make an interesting and valuable contribution to the history of printing and publishing in London, for the details of it indicate many intricate customs as to the relations of printer, publisher, and bookseller, which certainly will be henceforth much more easily intelligible. Mr. E. D. North contributes an article on 'American Book Clubs,' which is not at all interesting on account of the paucity of the material at his command; and Mr. Falconer Madan says a good word for the Bibliographical Society, and insists very rightly upon the absurdity of limiting the number of its members.

Transactions of the Bibliographical Society. Vol. II. Part II., Vol. III. Part I. (The Society.)—These Transactions, although less elaborately printed than the numbers of Bibliographica, are intrinsically no less valuable, for some of the papers are of the most useful description and by their nature of a more exhaustive character than any to be found elsewhere. With the exception of the presidential address, which deals for the most part with disconnected generalities, the contributions to these two parts are complete studies on particular and erudite points in bibliography, which once settled are not likely to be dealt with again for many years to come. Dr. Copinger contributes a paper of this kind, which is added to his vague presidential utterance, although it has but the faintest connexion with it. This is his 'Incunabula Virgiliana,' which consists of a list of editions of Virgil printed during the fifteenth century. Mr. G. F. Barwick on 'The Lutheran Press at Wittenberg' throws into relief some curious literary piracies which would hardly be likely to occur to-day. Sermons and religious tracts formed the subject of such proceedings then. Some good illustrations accompany this article as well as that by Mr. E. F. Strange on 'The Writing-Books of the Sixteenth Century.' Mr. Strange's researches into the history of alphabets must have led him into this by-path, but for the excursion we cannot be too grateful. Mr. G. R. Redgrave deals with 'Some Early Book-Illustrations of the Oppenheim Press,' in which his attention is very largely occupied with the work of Jacob Köbel. The first book printed at Oppenheim was in 1494, but there does not seem to exist any dated book of Köbel's before 1505 or after 1524. But there is an "I. K." signature to many fine wood-blocks which were used in books printed as late as 1545, and Jacob Köbel, known to be an engraver who used to write prefaces as well as to print them, and was also town clerk, may possibly be this "I. K.," although Mr. Redgrave is unable to establish the point satisfactorily. The most practical and valuable contribution to these Transactions is the 'List of Books and Papers on Printing under the Countries and Towns to which They Refer,' which was begun by the late Talbot Baines Reed and has been continued and edited by Mr. A. W. Pollard. The thanks of all bibliographers and librarians are due to the editor of this list for the trouble spent over his task and for the completeness with which he has accomplished it. It is a work which should certainly be issued separately for use as a handbook for all cataloguers, literary students, librarians, and bibliographers, and we hope shortly to see it in this form.

OUR LIBRARY TABLE.

THE second instalment of the magnificent edition of Mr. Meredith's complete works which Messrs. Constable are publishing, Vols. III. and IV., contains Evan Harrington. Those who enjoyed its perusal when it appeared in Once a Week must now be a limited circle; but the book is as delightful reading now as it was then.

ALL lovers of the country and the "happy garden state" will welcome the new edition of The Plant-lore and Garden-craft of Shakespeare, by H. N. Ellacombe (Arnold), which is now pleasantly illustrated with scenes from Shakspeare's country and little sketches of flowers. The claims of the marsh marigold to be the Elizabethan flower of that name are rightly rejected; but the illustration (p. 165) clearly represents Caltha palustris, though simply labelled "Marigold." We may note that "keck" or "kex" is a term used for all the larger Umbelliferæ in their growing state. It is a pity that in this new edition the index, which is deficient, has not been improved. Read also Wither for "Withers" twice on p. 167.

SIR HENRY CUNNINGHAM'S excellent monograph Lord Bowen: a Biographical Sketch, is no doubt already known to several of our readers, and has now been issued for the general public by Mr. Murray. It well deserves a wide circulation, for it is an eminently readable memoir of a remarkable man. The frontispiece is a capital likeness.

MESSRS. GEDDES, of Edinburgh, have published a pretty centenary edition of The Poems of Ossian, translated by James Macpherson. The handsome volume would be the better had the publishers dispensed with Mr. W. Sharp's injudicious introduction. Mr. Sharp is not to our knowledge a Celtic scholar, and even if he were the dogmatic tone in which he writes on the Ossianic question would be out of place.—The two newest additions to the "Canterbury Poets" (Scott) contain Browning's 'Pauline,' 'Paracelsus,' and his plays from 1833 to 1850. The volumes sent to us are bound in art linen, and contain a great deal in a small space. The reading public will doubtless appreciate in this convenient and neat form A Blot in the 'Scutcheon and other Poetic Dramas and Pippa Passes and other Poetic Dramas. Mr. Rinder's prefatory notes are rather verbose.

WE are glad to receive again such a practical and convenient volume as Dod's Peerage, Baronetage, and Knightage (Sampson Low & Co.). It is an excellent compilation, still disfigured by an advertisement on the back of its cloth binding.—The useful Almanach Hachette (Hachette) is once more on our table. It is a marvel of ingenuity, and contains a wonderful quantity of information of very various sorts.—The Catholic Directory (Burns & Oates) has reached the respectable age of sixty. It is a useful and well-arranged handbook.

THE HEAD MASTERS' CONFERENCE.

THE Head Masters' Conference met at Rugby on Tuesday, December 22nd, and was received with the usual lavish hospitality. The attendance, however, was disappointing, quite half the members being absent. The meetings were held in New Big School, a handsome building, but somewhat defective in acoustic properties, at least when a speaker addresses the platform from the body of the hall. The agenda paper was unusually long, but many of the motions were merely instructions to the Committee which did not require much discussion. The most important events of the meeting occupied only a few minutes, and are barely noticed in any report. It was agreed unanimously, on the motion of Mr. Welldon (Harrow), that the Committee of the Conference should co-operate with that of the Head Masters' Association to secure the creation of a strong central Council of Education; and it was agreed, also unanimously, on the motion of Dr. Gray (Bradfield), that the Conference should meet every alternate year in London. Both these resolutions are likely to have serious consequences in the near future.

Proceedings began on Tuesday with a vote of condolence with the family of the late Archbishop of Canterbury, who was formerly a master at Rugby. Mr. Keeling (Bradford) then moved "That the organization of secondary education is a matter of pressing necessity, and the Government should be urged to deal with the question in the next session of Parliament." Dr. Gow (Nottingham) opposed on the ground that neither the country nor the profession was yet ready for legislation. He called attention to several topics of vital interest which, he said, had not been discussed at all, and asserted that the apparent unanimity of many professional meetings was quite illusory. In this opinion he was supported by Mr. Selwyn (Uppingham), and the debate threatened to last the whole two days, when Mr. Welldon intervened to remind members that the Conference had passed the same resolution last year, and could not decently refuse to pass it again. After some conversation and a few disorderly speeches, the motion was carried by thirty-three votes to nine. Dr. James (Rugby) then moved "That the new regulations for Woolwich examinations will not be satisfactory unless the number of subjects a candidate can take up is diminished by at least one, and that a heavy one, below the present number." Many animated complaints followed from Mr. Furneaux (Repton), Mr. Laffan (Cheltenham), and others; but ultimately the Conference preferred a resolution, proposed by Mr. Bell (Marlborough), "That the new regulations for Woolwich examinations involve a disastrous increase of the burden of a curriculum which is already too heavy for candidates of the required age." It does not seem to have occurred to anybody to remark that this appeal for mercy was in striking contradiction to the "liberty, variety, and elasticity" which, as we were informed at Cambridge, are characteristic of our public schools. The discussion of private business, the dinner in Old Big School, and a very pleasant conversazione in the Art Museum concluded the day.

Business on Wednesday was so brisk that seven motions were carried in little more than three hours. First, the Committee was instructed to continue its communications with various bodies which undertake the training of teachers, and also to collect information in regard to the dismissal of assistant masters without appeal. Mr. Lyttelton (Haileybury) then proposed that the commanding officers of school volunteer corps should be asked to form a committee to report "on the existing condition of the school volunteer movement, and the means of increasing its efficiency." Mr. Dunn (Bath) protested against militarism in the schools, on the ground that it fostered the vice of unreasoning obedience; but the motion was carried, with a rider that the War Office should be invited to send an assessor to the Committee. The perennial complaint was then renewed against the dates appointed for scholarship examinations at the universities, and it was suggested by Dr. Gray that head masters should not allow boys to enter for any scholarships offered between Michaelmas and Christmas. This remedy seemed likely to produce a conflict with parents, and was not approved; but it was decided to make the usual representations to the college authorities. Mr. Moss (Shrewsbury) proposed that representations should also be made in order to secure better supervision of candidates for scholarships and matriculation. He had heard that some boys were injured by the unwise hospitality of their old schoolfellows, that candidates under examination had been disturbed by a noise in the college kitchens, &c. Other head masters related other enormities, and it was agreed that the Committee should institute inquiries. Mr. Welldon moved that the Committee should consult with the Committee of Head Masters of Preparatory Schools, in order "to relieve the congestion of subjects" now required in examinations for scholarships and for entrance at public schools. Mr. Dunn, if we are not mistaken, contended that a boy should learn at first a little of a great many subjects, and that the proposed restriction might operate as an outrage upon the holiness of childhood. These opinions, however, were so imperfectly heard that they did not affect the debate. Dr. James, with the concurrence of Dr. Warre (who was prevented by illness from attending the Conference), moved that, whatever else was dropped, Greek should still be required; and after the original resolution had been carried unanimously, this rider was also carried by eighteen votes to fourteen. Very few members remained to hear the motion of Mr. Culley (Monmouth) in favour of a decimal system of weights and measures, which was carried unanimously. The usual votes of thanks to Dr. James and his colleagues were then passed, and the Conference adjourned, to meet again in London next December.

GENERAL MEREDITH READ, F.S.A.

The death of General Meredith Read, which occurred after a brief illness at his residence in Paris on Sunday last, will be heard of with deep regret by the large circle of his friends in Europe and in America. There is something almost tragic in this event, which has fallen on the moment when the closing chapters of a work which had occupied many years of his life were under revision.

General Meredith Read was the son of an eminent jurist, Chief Justice Read, of Pennsylvania (grandson of George Read, signer of the Declaration of Independence), and was born in 1837. He was educated in a military academy, and afterwards graduated at Brown University, Rhode Island. He graduated at the Albany Law School in 1859, studied international law in Europe, and was admitted to the bar in Philadelphia. Having removed to Albany, he was made Adjutant-General of New York in 1860, and served through the civil war with distinction. He afterwards became interested in early American history, the most important of his contributions being an 'Historical Inquiry concerning Heinrich Hudson, his Friends, Relatives, and Early Life, his Connexion with the Muscovy Company, and Discovery of Delaware Bay,' Albany, 1866; reprinted in abridged form among the Clarendon Society's Reports, 1882. In 1869 he was appointed United States Consul-General for France and Algeria, and in 1873 Minister in Greece, a post he occupied until 1879, and it was mainly through his endeavours that restrictions on the sale of the Bible in Greece were removed. The king conferred on him the Grand Cross of the Order of the Redeemer. General Read rendered important services to eminent Englishmen during that period, and his friendship for this country was accompanied by extensive studies of its history. While at Athens he contributed to the Archæological Society of Greece a memorial letter on 'The Death of Philip Henry, Fifth Earl of Stanhope.' At the Gibbon Exhibition in London his loan of the historian's Bible attracted much attention.

General Read's contributions to historical research, though valuable, as the columns of the Athenæum attest, have not been voluminous, for the reason that for many years he devoted his life to the large work now nearly through the press. An early enthusiasm for Gibbon led him, on his retirement from public life, to make a pilgrimage to Lausanne, with the result of a temporary residence there, and researches which ultimately filled one or two rooms of his house in Paris with historical documents and relics. These relate not merely to ancient Swiss cities and celebrities, but to those of Savoy and other regions, and include many letters of eminent men which have never seen the light, among these a number written by Voltaire. It is known to those intimate with General Read that he had for some twenty years been working on these materials, while also adding to them, and that the work when it appears cannot fail to be a monument of unwearied research and labour.

The General was a high-minded generous gentleman, who through his military and diplomatic career had preserved a youthful simplicity, frankness, and impulsiveness. His beautiful home in the Rue la Boëtie was a centre of hospitality, and he numbered among his friends many French men of letters as well as statesmen, whom he entertained by his conversation, always rich in experience and information. His decease will be deeply deplored by those who have enjoyed his friendship, who best know his large affectionate heart and his perfect integrity.

THOMAS J. WISE.

THE ENGLISH TRANSLATION OF PROF. MASPERO'S 'STRUGGLE OF THE NATIONS.'

THE second volume of Prof. Maspero's great work 'Histoire Ancienne des Peuples de l'Orient Classique' has just appeared in an English translation, issued under the auspices of the Society for Promoting Christian Knowledge, simultaneously with the French original. The object of the present note is to call the attention of English readers to the manner in which Prof. Maspero's text has, in certain passages, been surreptitiously tampered with in the translation.

Prof. Maspero in his survey of ancient nations includes a sketch of the history of Israel. This history Prof. Maspero view s throughout from the standpoint of modern criticism. In his previous smaller work on the ancient history of the peoples of the East he stated explicitly that he adopted the historical conclusions of Reuss and Wellhausen (fourth edition, 1886, p. 301). In his present work he adopts them equally, without the smallest ambiguity, and frequently in his notes refers to the works of these and other critics with approval. Such an endorsement, on the part of a distinguished archæologist, of the conclusions of modern criticism could, of course, not be admitted by the Society for Promoting Christian Knowledge. Accordingly, without giving his readers the smallest hint of the fact, the translator, Mr. McClure, alters in his translation the text of the passages in question, so as to make Prof. Maspero appear throughout as an orthodox traditionalist. The method principally adopted, when once its secret has been discovered, is sufficiently simple. In the text, where Prof. Maspero wrote "Tradition related" (or some equivalent phrase), Mr. McClure substitutes "The narrative says." In the notes, views expressed by Prof. Maspero as his own are transformed into those held by "some critics," without any indication whatever that they are in reality Prof. Maspero's as well. Occasionally, of course, alterations of a different kind or omissions are also to be met with. The reader will judge best of the process which has been followed by a few illustrations (the italics are in all cases my own).

1. "The Biblical narrative describes at length their marches," &c. [in the wilderness].—P. 445.

"Enough can still be made out to give us a general idea of the march of the emigrants."—P. 445, n. 1.

"The Israelites did not act throughout with that unity of purpose and energy which we might at first sight have attributed to them."—P. 681.

"And we have some details of his [Samson's] history."—P. 703.

"Story of the Levite of Ephraim, in which the important historical event is the massacre of the pillaging clan by its neighbours."—P. 705, n. 4.

"It contained the two tables of the Mosaic law."—P. 706.

"The facts given in Jos. xviii. 1 show that the date of its foundation there goes back," &c.—P. 705, n. 2.

"His [Samuel's] position as judge of all Israel seems to have developed at a later period."—P. 708, n. 1.

"Les traditions recueillies dans leurs livres sacrés décrivaient longuement," &c.

"Il en reste assez sur place pour donner une idée générale de la marche que l'on prêtait à la colonne principale des émigrants."

"Israel n'agit pas avec autant d'ensemble et de vigueur qu'ils [the Hebrew chroniclers in the book of Joshua] se le figurèrent."

"Mais le détail de ses actions véritables avait été oublié de bonne heure."

"Histoire du Lévite d'Ephraim, dont..... le fond ne renferme qu'un seul élément historique, l'exécution du clan pillard," &c.

"Elle renfermait deux pierres sur lesquelles on crut plus tard que la loi avait été gravée" (with idée for "statement" in note 3).

"La tradition recueillie dans Jos. xviii. 1, en faisait remonter l'établissement," &c.

"Sa transformation en juge de tout Israel date de l'époque prophétique, comme celle d'Éli."

"Narrative" or "sacred writings" is also substituted for tradition (often with the past tense), p. 679, p. 696, l. 4, p. 709, l. 1 ("une tradition moins flatteuse"), p. 710, l. 1, p. 710, note 2, and elsewhere.

In p. 65, note 2, and on p. 70, by the substitution of "later times" for l'époque royale, the fact is concealed that Prof. Maspero holds the narratives of Genesis in question to have been composed under the monarchy.

2. "For Wellhausen's theory of the probable date of this episode [Gen. xxvii.], cf. Wellhausen."—P. 66, n. 4.

"The episode of Othniel and Chushan-rishathaim..... is by many critics rejected as spurious.'—P. 685, n. 2.

"For Stade's view as to the later development of Judah, see....."—P. 702, n. 1.

"Budde.....endeavours to show that these events were attributed at a later date to Joshua."—P. 703, n. 2.

"Some critics think....."—P. 712.

"1 Sam. xxiv. thought by some writers to have been of much later date."—P. 717, n. 3.

"Sur l'âge probable de cette tradition, cf. Wellhausen....."

"..... repose, de l'aveu général, sur une tradition sans valeur."

"Sur la formation de Judah, et sur l'époque tardive à laquelle il se constitua définitivement sous son apparence historique, cf. Stade....."

"Sur ces faits, qui ont été attribués plus tard à la conquête de Josué, cf. Budde....."

"La tradition lui attribua plus tard....."

"1 Sam. xxiv., légende populaire dont la rédaction définitive est d'assez basse époque."

Other instances in which opinions expressed by Prof. Maspero as his own have been transformed similarly into those of "some critics" will be found on p. 684, p. 686, notes 3 and 4, p. 693, note 3, p. 696, note 4, p. 702, line 6, p. 704, note 2, p. 705, note 4, p. 706, note 4, p. 712, notes 3 and 4, p. 714, notes 5 and 7, p. 715, note 1, p. 720, note 4, and elsewhere. P. 714, note 5, and p. 718, note 3, "imagined" and "pretend" are terms of disparagement introduced gratuitously by the translator: in the original the views expressed in these notes are those of the author himself.

3. Passages in which Prof. Maspero's recognition of the value of critical studies has been suppressed:—

"Various works have appeared of late dealing with these books [Exodus to Deuteronomy] from a critical point of view."—P. 447, n. 3.

"On trouvera, dans l'un quelconque des nombreux manuels publiés en Allemagne, l'analyse de ces livres et les opinions courantes sur l'âge des documents qu'il renferme."

Here are two notes which have been omitted in the English translation:—

"Le refus qu'on lui prête dans la rédaction actuelle du Livre des Juges viii. 22, 23, trahit, comme le feront par la suite les déclarations de Samuel contre la royauté, l'influence du temps où les idées prophétiques prédominaient."—P. 692, n. 1.

A translation is a translation, and its sole raison d'être is that it represents faithfully the text of the author. The effect of the alterations and omissions which I have signalized is that in the account which the volume contains of the history and literature of Israel the entire perspective of the author is changed: the reader purchases a book which professes, on this as on other subjects, to give him the opinions and conclusions of Prof. Maspero himself, whereas in reality it gives him something altogether different.

It is surprising that the Society for Promoting Christian Knowledge should have sanctioned this piece of literary bad faith, and that either Prof. Sayce, the editor, or Mr. McClure, the translator, should have lent his hand to it. If the Society undertook to present Prof. Maspero's work to the English public, it is clear that the only straightforward course for them to adopt was either to present it faithfully in every particular, or to prefix a note (which, however, I do not find) stating unambiguously that Prof. Maspero in the original work treated the Old Testament from a critical standpoint, and often expressed sympathy with critics and their work, but that, as they felt sure that their readers would be justly shocked by such views, they had authorized the translator to do his best to eliminate them. VERAX.

Literary Gossip.

MR. BUXTON FORMAN will shortly publish a work entitled 'The Books of William Morris: an Essay in Bibliography,' somewhat on the plan of his volume called 'The Shelley Library'—that is to say, setting forth in a connected narrative the public appearances of the author in a way calculated to give the student and collector such exact bibliographical knowledge of the whole of the printed works as the present age requires concerning not only great men like Morris, but many minor literati. It is intended to give several facsimiles and other illustrations, and to add information about manuscripts. Communications from the possessors of any of Morris's manuscripts would be gratefully received by Mr. Forman, who would be glad to hear, indeed, of any out-of-the-way items cognate to the subject of a work at once narrative and bibliographical. His address is 46, Marlborough Hill, St. John's Wood.

MR. S. R. GARDINER lately discovered in the Vatican archives a despatch written by Rossetti early in 1642, when he was nuncio at Cologne, and describing Charles I.'s plan for the rescue of Strafford by the aid of troops from Ireland and Holland. This evidence, which is important as coming from one in the confidence of the Court, will be published in the January number of the English Historical Review.

IN the same number Mr. James Gairdner will continue his discussion of 'New Lights on the Divorce of Henry VIII.' Mr. J. R. Tanner writes on 'The Administration of the Navy from the Restoration to the Revolution'; Mr. J. H. Clapham on 'A Royalist Spy during the Reign of Terror'; and Mr. R. Seymour Long on 'Andrew Jackson and the National Bank.'

THE Clarendon Press will publish shortly the Hebrew original of ten chapters of Ecclesiasticus (xxxix. 15 to xlix. 11) lately discovered in the East. It was generally supposed that St. Jerome was the last scholar who saw or possessed it, until recently a Hebrew treatise, written by Saadiah Gaon (about 920 A.D.), was found, in which the author quotes several sentences in Hebrew from Ecclesiasticus. Thus the book was still extant at that time in Bagdad, where Saadiah lived. No further trace of the Hebrew text was discovered until about June, 1896, when a MS. leaf brought to England by Mrs. Lewis, of Cambridge, was recognized by Mr. S. Schechter as a portion of the long-lost original, and was published by him in the Expositor. Almost simultaneously nine leaves of the same MS., brought likewise from the East, were identified in the Bodleian Library. The Clarendon Press is now issuing a critical edition of all ten leaves, consisting of the Hebrew original, accompanied by an English translation and the Greek, Syriac, and Old Latin versions, followed by a glossary of new forms found in the Hebrew text, and of words used in new senses. A list is added of the proverbs of Jesus, son of Sirach, genuine and spurious, found in Talmudic and Rabbinic literature, arranged according to the order of the Greek version. The preface gives full literary particulars respecting the book. One main result of the new text is that it proves Sirach to have written classical Hebrew (with the exception of a few New-Hebrew words). Two facsimile pages, the first and last of the Oxford fragment, are appended, showing marginal notes of various readings, somewhat resembling the Massora to the Old Testament.

MR. ARTHUR DASENT, whose forthcoming book on Mayfair is now approaching completion, would be grateful for the loan of any unpublished letters, especially of the eighteenth century, referring to individual houses in Berkeley Square, Hill Street, Charles Street, Curzon Street, and the neighbourhood generally. Communications intended for Mr. Dasent may be addressed to Messrs. Macmillan.

THE Queen has just accepted the dedication of the little collection of hymns for use at the celebrations of the sixtieth year of her reign, which Messrs. Skeffington & Son will publish during this month. Among the writers are the Bishop of Ripon, the Rev. S. J. Stone, Mr. Chatterton Dix, Canon Twells, Canon Rawnsley, &c., while special tunes will be supplied by Sir John Stainer, Sir Walter Parratt, Dr. Bridge (of Westminster), Dr. G. Martin (of St. Paul's), and others.

THE authorship of Scottish poetry threatens to supply matter of controversy as exhaustless as the battle of Hastings. Another of Prof. Skeat's verdicts is to be attacked. The metrical 'Legends of the Saints,' originally attributed by the late Mr. Bradshaw to John Barbour, were subsequently edited as his by Dr. Horstmann. Contrary arguments of German birth were favoured by Prof. Skeat, on the strength of which the ascription was rejected and the legends re-edited as anonymous by Dr. Metcalfe for the Scottish Text Society. Mr. George Neilson is reassailing the question in the Scottish Antiquary for January. He disputes the validity of the rhyme-canon of Dr. Buss, and adduces parallels of substance and diction between 'The Bruce' and the St. Ninian legend conclusive, in his opinion, that only one pen could have written both. As the Ninian legend has passages found verbatim also in another of the legends, it is in a sense the key of the collection, and the authorship of the whole will almost certainly depend on that of the part.

MESSRS. LUZAC & Co. write:—

"We were much surprised to see in last week's issue of the Athenæum our name mentioned as publishers of a work by Mr. H. W. Mengedott. No arrangement whatever was made by us as regards this or any other work by Mr. H. W. Mengedott."

AN interesting relic of Pope and Gay has recently been unearthed by Mr. Buxton Forman in his peregrinations among the London bookshops. This is no other than the copy of Gay's 'Trivia' presented by the author to Pope, the fact being authenticated by a bold inscription in Pope's handwriting: "Ex dono Authoris." It is one of the exceedingly few copies which were produced on large paper, and is in beautiful preservation. These large-paper copies have more than a fancy interest; for in them the woodcut scroll ornaments at the headings of the three books of 'Trivia' were superseded in favour of three charming oblong copper-plates, the first a pretty contemporary view of London, the other two the Pegasus and lyre engravings which were used in the first complete or five-canto edition of 'The Rape of the Lock,' published in 1712, the year before Gay wrote his 'Trivia.' It was of course natural that, if Gay had a large-paper copy at all, he should present it to his colleague (with Arbuthnot) in the production of 'Three Hours after Marriage'; and the book is a most interesting find.

THE Cambridge Historical Tripos examination is henceforth to be divided into two parts, the latter including comparative and deductive politics, and a select subject in the history of thought, literature, or art. At Oxford the Christmas examination for Mathematical Moderations has been discontinued.

BISHOP PEARSON during the later years of his life compiled a commonplace book of remarkable passages and striking thoughts which he met with in the course of reading. His widow has placed these in the hands of Mr. Elliot Stock, who will publish them very shortly in a volume, with a preface by the Bishop of Manchester.

As an indication of the continued progress of the Finnish language as a literary vehicle, we note that the number of periodicals written in Finnish and published in 1896 was 111, of which 100 appeared in Finland and 11 abroad. In Finland were also published 72 periodicals in Swedish, and 4 in both Finnish and Swedish.

FOLK-LORISTS may be interested to hear that the Society for "Bayerische Volkskunde und Mundart-Forschung," the foundation of which we announced some time ago, will shortly issue the first volume of its Mitteilungen.

Problems of Biology. By George Sandeman, M.A. (Sonnenschein & Co.)

THIS essay has just missed being a valuable contribution to a very interesting discussion. It gives evidence of original thought and wide reading, but its style is such that the class of readers to whom it would have been really useful will never master its contents.

Shortly stated, Mr. Sandeman's object is to test the current theories of life and development from the point of view of philosophy. It was high time some one undertook the task, for the biologist who resents any intrusion of metaphysics into what he is pleased to consider the domain of fact, and looks upon the world as "made in compartments answering to university lectureships," is unfortunately no figment of Mr. Sandeman's imagination. It is precisely to him that 'Problems of Biology' might have been helpful, perhaps even inspiring, whereas we fear that it will be merely unintelligible, for Mr. Sandeman seems to have read German until he has lost the power of writing English.

His first argument is that "the doctrine of the independence of science from philosophy, always over-emphasized, has, in the case of biology, no meaning whatever..... the problem of philosophy as regards organisms is the problem of biology."

This is rather an overstatement of the case, but it is pleasant to find the case stated at all. Having thus defined his position, Mr. Sandeman proceeds to review in detail the chief biological hypotheses. In each case the questions asked are the same: Firstly, in what, according to the hypothesis under consideration, does the unity of the organism—"the very category of biology," as Mr. Sandeman calls it—consist? And secondly, can an unassailable theory of the unity—of identity in difference—be built up upon the hypothesis? We agree with him that satisfactory answers to these questions are not given by any hypothesis according to which the parts of the organism, or the organism and its environment, are looked upon as unrelated particulars, acting independently of one another. That they postulate this "independence of differences" is the accusation which he brings against the systems of Herbert Spencer, Weismann, Naegeli, and Lamarck. Criticism from a new point of view is always interesting, and we have seldom read a closer piece of reasoning than Mr. Sandeman's account of these hypotheses as interpreted by the light of Hegel and Hartmann; only it requires the patience of a conscientious reviewer to follow him through the perplexing phraseology in which he clothes his argument.

The chapter on "Natural Selection" is quite the weakest part of the book. Here, for instance, is a surprising statement:—

"A species is at no time, in fact, more numerous than can be supported by its means of subsistence, and it seems probable that it never comes near to such a limit."

We suppose Mr. Sandeman means the individuals of a species, in which case the first part of the sentence is a logical quibble, untrue "in fact"; and we know of no reason why the second part "seems probable," unless it is that Dr. Hutchison Stirling finds no reference to the struggle for existence in 'The Voyage of the Beagle,' a reason which is scarcely convincing. And this section is worse than weak, it is in bad taste. Only a very young man could be pardoned for writing as follows:—

"And the achievement of the method [natural selection] is not to explain anything which is, but it is merely to afford us a transition from the really unintelligible of accidental production, to the formally intelligible of conditioned existence. It enables one to follow, hypothetically, the production of the parts of the system of the body, or of the organism and environment, as unconditioned by the other parts of those systems. Then, at a certain point which cannot be shown as phenomenal, these parts come into collision with their conditions, and those only which fit the latter (that is, all those which exist) come to be selected. Thus the Darwinian thunderclap follows upon its proper blaze of abstraction. And all that it succeeds in doing is to offer to us an empty formula of explanation which enables us to explain the parts as essentially unrelated to one another. In this respect, and in harmony with the first postulate, it is an alogical principle, and is necessarily, as in fact, without interest to research."

The average biologist is as little given to hero-worship as any man, but the above will make him rail against "ignorant philosophers," so that, on yet another ground than that of style, the barrier between him and Mr. Sandeman seems impassable. There are, however, a good many psychologists who understand the German of the philosophers, though they accept unquestioningly the most mechanical theories of life from their teachers of physiology. To them we recommend Mr. Sandeman's essay; and if it is not called for in too great a hurry, we expect to see his new edition largely "revised and amended."

Science Gossip.

We are exceedingly sorry to hear of the decease, at Berlin, of Prof. E. du Bois-Reymond, after a brief illness. He was born in 1818 at Berlin, and began in 1837 studying theology in the University there. After a year of this he migrated to Bonn and devoted his time to geology, but in 1839 the influence of Johannes Müller drew him back to his native city. As early as 1841 he began his celebrated researches into the electricity of nerve and muscle. His striking investigations in this direction attracted the attention of Humboldt, owing to whose encouragement he was able to publish his celebrated 'Untersuchungen über die thierische Elektricität,' and who welcomed him on his election to the Prussian Academy of Sciences in 1850. In 1858 he succeeded Johannes Müller in his chair. In 1868 he became Permanent Secretary of the Academy. His writings on physiology were, it is hardly necessary to say, numerous and important, and the physiologists of the present day owe him a deep debt of gratitude. His lectures 'Ueber die Grenzen des Naturerkennens,' 'Sieben Welträtsel,' and 'Goethe und kein Ende,' were known to all educated men in his own country and to many outside.

The planet Mercury will be at greatest eastern elongation from the sun on the evening of the 6th inst., and will, therefore, be visible after sunset during the first half of the month in the constellation Capricornus. Venus is increasing in brilliancy as an evening star, moving in an easterly direction through Aquarius into Pisces; she will be in conjunction with the crescent moon on the 6th. Mars is decreasing in brightness; he is almost stationary in the heavens, situated in the north-eastern part of Taurus, and will be in close conjunction with the moon not long before setting on the morning of the 15th. Jupiter rises now about 10 o'clock in the evening, in the constellation Leo. Saturn is in the western part of Scorpio, and does not rise until past 4 o'clock in the morning.

The elements of Mr. Perrine's new comet (g, 1896) to which reference was made in our "Notes" last week were calculated by Messrs. Hussey and Perrine from early observations. Dr. F. Ristenpart, of Heidelberg, has made another determination of the orbit, with the result that the perihelion passage took place on the 1st ult. The brightness continues to decrease; and the comet is now situated in the constellation Eridanus, its approximate place for to-night (January 2nd) being, according to Dr. Ristenpart's ephemeris, R.A. $3^h\ 33^m$, N.P.D. 90° 57′, and for next Wednesday (the 6th) R.A. $3^h\ 53^m$, N.P.D. 91° 19′.

FINE ARTS

The Communion Plate of the Parish Churches in the County of London. By Edwin Freshfield, Jun. (Privately printed.)

In a former number we had the pleasure of noticing Mr. Freshfield's excellent work on 'The Communion Plate of the Churches in the City of London.' He has now issued a companion volume on 'The Communion Plate of the Parish Churches in the County of London,' and it is pleasant to find it is to be followed by a monograph on 'The Church Plate of the County of Middlesex.' For some occult reason Mr. Freshfield has again chosen to print his work "privately."

The bulk of the present as of the former volume is occupied by a descriptive inventory of the plate, but this is prefaced by an important introduction, divided into two sections. The first begins by explaining what churches are dealt with in the work and what are omitted. Out of upwards of three hundred contained within the eighteen rural deaneries in the county of London outside the City, forty-two only are parish churches, the rest being churches of ecclesiastical parishes and districts of modern origin, and possessing, it is presumed, no plate of any archæological value. All these accordingly are omitted from the work "excepting those built under the Union of Benefices Act," &c.

For historical purposes Mr. Freshfield divides the parish churches into two classes: (1) those of ancient parishes which have existed from time immemorial, and (2) those of certain statutory parishes separated from the ancient parishes by legislation during the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries. Of these a table is appended, mentioning the parish and the date of its creation, the dedication and date of the church, and the name of its architect when known. Some interesting details are also supplied concerning the cost of the later churches. But the greater part of the section is taken up by an account of the working of the Union of Benefices Act, an excuse for which is found in the scattering of plate brought about by the destruction of the City churches. On this subject Mr. Freshfield entered at length in his former volume, and his readers will cordially agree with him that "every obstacle should be put in the way of anything like wholesale demolition."

From the second section of the introduction, which treats of the general characteristics of the plate, we learn that in the county of London not a single mediæval piece of plate has survived. In the City, on the contrary, five specimens have escaped destruction. In the county, too, nearly all the Elizabethan and Jacobean plate has disappeared, and the bulk of the vessels are post-Restoration, eighteenth century, or modern. The last-named, as Mr. Freshfield points out, are usually copied from one or two typical pieces of pre-Reformation plate still preserved in this country, "and in nine cases out of ten, where the artist has tried to improve on the old model, with design or detail of his own invention, the result is a failure." Almost all the plate in the county of London is the work of London goldsmiths, the exceptions being some three or four pieces of provincial make and about half a dozen foreign pieces. Among these last are cups at Bromley and Fulham, and a little goblet at St. Mary-le-Strand.

Among the materials used are a number of jugs, flagons, or cruets made of glass, no doubt because they are cheap, and anything is good enough for a church according to some people; but the use of glass for chalices, as at St. James's, Clerkenwell, is contrary to all ancient custom and should be avoided.

Among the flagons there seems to be much diversity of shape. The prevalent pattern is the tankard, both of the tall type and the shorter, with flat lids, but in later examples the lid is domed. Most of the examples are quite plain, but an elaborate set of three round-bellied flagons is in use at St. James's, Piccadilly, and a handsome tall tankard not unlike the well-known Norwich and Bristol examples is preserved at Kensington.

Of cups only one of the Edwardian type exists (at St. Margaret's, Westminster), and of the Elizabethan period but four have survived. Eleven Stuart examples, six made during the Commonwealth, and thirteen later are all there are of the seventeenth century. There are in addition to the cups of the usual type several others that are of peculiar form or of secular origin. At Bromley both the vessels that serve as chalices are secular and foreign, one being a tall Nuremberg cup, the other a small Augsburg hanap. Hampstead is fortunate in the possession of a very fine steepled hanap, made in 1629, and presented to the church in 1747, and Kensington has a cup of the same type, but without a cover; it is also earlier, with the hall-marks for 1599. At Fulham is a fine steepled cup with characteristic bulbed bowl and cover, of Nuremberg make, given in 1689; and the same church has also a very pretty pair of English cups, made in 1615, with steepled covers.

The paten-covers with which many cups are provided, and patens proper, call for no general remark. They conform to the usual types of either a flat circular plate, or the same mounted on a short foot or stem. Only one example is earlier than 1624. A pretty lobed dish of Lübeck make of the sixteenth century serves as a paten at St. Mary Abbots, Kensington, and two Hamburg basins with repoussé work on the rims are in use at St. Mary-le-Strand. A paten almost of mediæval type with peculiar raised ornament, and the cup to which it belongs, also with like ornament, were given to the latter church in 1712.

The almsdishes, as Mr. Freshfield points out, are in general extremely poor. The large and handsome example at St. James's, Piccadilly, made in 1683, has the Last Supper in high relief in the centre, and a repoussé border with fruit, &c. St. Margaret's, Westminster, possesses a similar example, though not so good and a few years later in date. Both measure nearly two feet in diameter.

As in most collections of plate, that in the churches of the county of London includes many articles of a miscellaneous character, such as a rose-water ewer, two baptismal bowls, snuffboxes, chairmen's hammers, and the like. The most remarkable of all is the famous tobacco-box belonging to the parish of St. Margaret,

Westminster. The original box is a small one of horn, engraved with the arms of the city of Westminster and a bust of the Duke of Cumberland within a series of trophies, from a design by Hogarth. It was given to the parish in 1713, but has since been enclosed in six successive outer cases, the surfaces of which are covered with names of various persons and with engravings of events of local or national importance.

The beadles' staves in the county of London are considered by Mr. Freshfield to be "quite as good if not better than those in the City" (sic). They are over seventy in number, and may be divided into (1) those with pear-shaped knobs, (2) those surmounted by statuettes, models, or other devices, and (3) short maces or wands. By far the larger number belong to the second class, many excellent examples of which are figured in the work. Although, on the whole, the church plate of the county cannot be compared with that in the City as regards the antiquity of individual pieces or in general artistic interest, there are, as we have seen, many articles of unusual excellence.

Mr. Freshfield's inventories, like those in his former volume, appear to be carefully and thoroughly done. They include the measurements, weights, hall-marks (where any), and short descriptions of each piece, and are not overburdened with unnecessary notes on the genealogy of the donors. A useful classified table of every piece of plate (each class arranged in chronological order, with diagrams of the makers' marks), and a list of donors of plate, conclude the volume. No index of the many persons and places mentioned in it is vouchsafed, but on the appearance of the volume on the church plate of Middlesex we are promised a general index to the three volumes.

The twenty-four plates that form the only illustrations to this volume are collotype reproductions of large photographs taken for the purpose. Several of them — such as the picture of the great almsdish at St. James's, Piccadilly, and that of the curious dish at St. George's-in-the-East, and the groups of plate at Stepney, Kensington (St. Mary Abbots), and St. Mary-le-Strand—leave nothing to be desired. The eleven plates devoted to the beadles' staves are also excellent. We should, however, like to know why these eleven plates alone are numbered, while the other thirteen plates, which alternate with them, are not numbered at all. The finding of the plates is on this account no easy matter, and the difficulty is increased by the printer's stupid habit of not numbering the pages that begin with a new parish. Thus out of the first twenty, only 9, 12, 14, and 17 are paged, and of the second twenty, only 21, 23, 31, 35, 37, and 39. Among the former six plates are distributed, and another six among the latter; but as the index of illustrations refers the reader in the case of each of these twelve plates to unnumbered pages, the finding of them is rather a trial to one's patience and temper. Perhaps Mr. Freshfield will see that this defect does not occur in his third volume.

The work is admirably printed and illustrated throughout, and bound in unglazed buckram; but we should have liked a label or lettered title on the back.

ANNUALS.

The Art Journal, 1896 (Virtue & Co.), opens with a clear and firm, but rather too light version of Mr. Stanhope Forbes's capital picture 'Forging the Anchor.' In the first article that accomplished writer Mr. Claud Phillips describes the collection of pictures formed by Mr. G. McCulloch, and rightly deplores the breaking up of certain historic gatherings of works of art which were intact when Dr. Waagen took his very imperfect and too often perfunctory census of the art treasures of Great Britain. But Mr. Phillips rather overestimates the value of the German critic's labours, and he somewhat exaggerates our loss of pictorial wealth. No doubt, however, we have parted with a number of fine things, and it is probable that recent social changes, especially the gradual impoverishment of the "once landed class," whose forefathers in the last century had knowledge, taste, and wealth enough to collect works of art, will entail still greater losses. If it is a special function and duty of a long-established contemporary to extol with the pencil as well as the pen a certain number of painters whose reputations have yet to be made, and others who are not likely to establish a reputation at all, then we are bound to say that the Art Journal of to-day is at once conscientious and enterprising in acting up to its honourable principles, so that we read in its pages of several of the illustrious obscure. A few papers enrich the present volume whose writers aim at better things and endeavour to direct popular taste to design of a high stamp. Much judgment and tact are shown in the engravings from some of the choicest contributions to current exhibitions, and the remarks upon them. It is pleasant, too, to read what Mr. George Leslie and Mr. F. Eaton have to tell us about 'The Royal Academy in the Present Century,' and there are several capital illustrations of sculpture, ancient and modern, British as well as foreign. A great proportion of the larger cuts and plates are quite up to the standard of the Art Journal. The articles are, as a rule, well written, thoughtful, and competent; their characteristic defect is, as we have before said, their brevity, a defect which seldom fails to damp the enthusiasm of the writers.

The Magazine of Art, 1896. (Cassell & Co.) — There is great improvement in the very numerous page cuts and plates which add much to the attractions of this portly and handsomely printed volume. Among the best of the plates are the frontispiece after M. Aubert's charming 'Country Cousins,' here so called; Mr. M. Raeburn's etching of 'Greenwich Pensioners,' after Millais; and the photograph of W. Hunt's famous drawing in Mr. Humphry Roberts's collection entitled 'Preparing for the Soirée.' A special feature of the volume is the series of cuts after pictures and drawings by Lord Leighton and Sir John Millais, all of them characteristic and excellent, and employed to illustrate an elaborate and sympathetic set of essays by Mr. Spielmann. Similar transcripts accompany the notices of Sir E. Burne-Jones's studies. Among the most satisfactory portions of the letterpress are Mr. J. Guille Millais's papers on 'Sport in Art,' a well-treated and ably illustrated theme which deserves developing on a much larger scale than the Magazine could admit of; Mr. W. Crane's discourses on 'The Influence of Architectural Style upon Design,' a valuable notice of an interesting matter; Mr. J. Ward's 'Reminiscences of Leighton'; and Mr. J. S. Gardner's 'Ironwork at South Kensington.' One or two writers betray curious ignorance of the subjects they have written upon; the most conspicuous of these instances is afforded by the anonymous 'Was Hogarth a Plagiarist?' Another instance is Mr. Burtchaell's note on 'The Portrait of Queen Elizabeth lately discovered at Siena,' p. 419, the author of which did not know of another version—doubtless the original of the picture—which has long been in a renowned English gallery. A third and most flagrant instance is Mr. J. Pennell's 'An Experiment.'

The Pageant, 1897 (Henry & Co.), is in some respects a spasmodic magazine, replete with tales of hysterical terrors and curious legends curiously told and wondrously involved. The "Foreword," a laudatory note on the contributors, is hardly justified by the contents of the book, certainly not by its illustrations, the majority of which are very poor—whatever their originals may be. The best of the essays are Mr. E. Gosse's 'Jules Barbey d'Aurevilly,' which, though a little cynical, is a good piece of writing, showing humour and research, and Mr. A. E. Abbott's 'God gave my Donkey Wings.' 'Virago,' by Mr. W. D. Scull, is a well-composed story. Mr. Austin Dobson's verses 'Postscript to "Retaliation"' deserve, if anything could, a place by Goldsmith's genial satire. The best of the cuts, all things considered, is that which reproduces Rossetti's very fine pen drawing of 'Hamlet and Ophelia.' That an original so crude and dull as Mr. C. H. Shannon's rough sketch of a female model resuming her garments, which is rather boldly called 'A Wounded Amazon,' should be copied at all is as surprising as the reproduction of 'Le Premier Bal,' by Mr. C. Conder, of which it is difficult to make anything. On the other hand, Mr. C. Ricketts's 'Autumn Muse' is a very pretty design indeed, suggesting Rossetti.

Vanity Fair Album. Vol. XXVIII. ('Vanity Fair' Office.)—No personage in Vanity Fair has been more interesting, or, we may say, better drawn, than Li Hung Chang, whose face and figure by "Guth" are really good and vigorous, and full of character and strength. Among the persons of whom we cannot speak from personal knowledge are several whom "Jehu Junior" describes as good-looking, handsome, and so forth. One would not gather this from their portraits, but it would be invidious to name in this connexion either the men or their likenesses. Fortunately perhaps, vol. xxviii. contains no pictures, true or false, of ladies; but are we to understand that no dames or damsels have made themselves notorious or important during 1896? It is impossible Mr. Alfred Austin can be the Poet Laureate and resemble the feeble personage who figures as No. 642; Mr. Hall Caine certainly does not look the fury he is represented to be in No. 651; Lord Yarborough's friends repudiate No. 661 as a likeness of that peer; but No. 662 may pass muster as a crude likeness of Mr. H. L. B. McCalmont. The young Marquis of Bath need not complain very bitterly about No. 668; nor can Viscount Curzon reasonably object, for his portrait is faithful and sympathetic, one of "Spy's" best works; we may say the same of the Duke of Bedford, but the likeness of Mr. W. Woodall (679) is dull; that of Mr. G. Meredith (659) is a caricature in the tiresome old style of Vanity Fair. One of the best likenesses is No. 641, of the late Mr. Du Maurier, by "Spy," who maintains his reputation in masculine likenesses such as No. 660, 'Sir W. MacCormac'; but he is not likely to increase it by performances like 'Sam Loates' (662) and 'Mr. C. C. Clarke' (664).

The Architectural Review, Vol. I. No. 1 ('Architectural Review' Office), is a new candidate for the honours of circulation, and, so far as we can see, appears fully to deserve them. The part before us, being that for November, contains a well-studied and sympathetic essay by Mr. J. E. Newberry on 'The Work of J. L. Pearson, R.A.,' with special reference to Truro Cathedral, illustrated by a plan and numerous photographic views of the building within and without. A series of papers on the City halls of London, by Mr. H. D. Lowry, is accompanied by clever, though flimsy illustrations by Mr. J. Pennell; and a competent account of the church of St. Bartholomew the Great, Smithfield, and its restoration by Mr. A. Webb, is supplied by Mr. C. E. Mallow. A notice of certain works in metal by Mr. N. and Mrs. E. Dawson is lightened by cuts after a number of excellent designs by the former.

PETERBOROUGH CATHEDRAL.

Sir Wollaston Franks, President of the Society of Antiquaries, has asked the Dean and Chapter of Peterborough to allow the professional advisers of the Society to make some further examination of the west front of the church, and has received a point-blank refusal.

On Tuesday the Chapter met, and it was resolved :—

"The Dean and Chapter regret that they are unable to accede to the request made by the President of the Society of Antiquaries for permission to make a further examination of the west front, with a view to the preparation of a specification for the repair of the north gable. On two different occasions during the present year they have given facilities to the Society for the Protection of Ancient Buildings to make full examinations of the west front, and they gave the deputation of the Society of Antiquaries access to every part of it on December 4th. But they consider that to grant the present request would have a significance which did not attach to any of the former occasions."

This, too, has a significance. It signifies that the Dean and Chapter have at last learnt that the Society of Antiquaries are very much in earnest, are well advised, and know quite well what they are about. It signifies further that the Dean and Chapter and the architects behind them, having made up their minds to pull down, are afraid of the alternative plan of repair advocated by the Society, and hope by locking the door to prevent the preparation of the Society's specification. There is a charming simplicity about this which recalls the Dean and Chapter's first act in the discussion, when they proposed to consider the objections to pulling down after two months, and to pull down meanwhile. But if our information is correct, as we believe it is, this has been thought of too late, for the specification is nearly ready, and the further examination of the building was only sought for the verification of a few points of secondary importance.

The resolution goes on :—

"The Dean and Chapter were as desirous as the Society of Antiquaries can be that the old work should, if possible, be left undisturbed, and it was with this end in view that they obtained a second professional opinion. They are now assured, not only by the distinguished architects whom they have consulted, but also by practical workers of the widest experience in dealing with ancient buildings, that the safety of the fabric is involved, and that the method of repair suggested by the Society is neither suitable nor possible in this case. They feel, therefore, that they would only be misleading the Society if they consented to an examination preparatory to a course of action which they have definitely decided not to adopt."

This has ever been the burden of their song, but the desire to leave undisturbed which is accompanied by an obstinate determination to pull down, and a refusal even to listen to those who offer at their own cost to demonstrate the possibility of repair without pulling down, is of a sort which requires some education for its proper appreciation. And the reference of the matter to Mr. Pearson and Sir Arthur Blomfield is, as we pointed out last week, no real reference at all.

The thanks of every Englishman are due to the Society of Antiquaries for the stand they have made in this matter, and for their refusal to accept as final any "ultimatum" of the Dean and Chapter so long as anything remains to be saved. They are fighting the cause of every old church in the land. Some nonsense has been written by ignorant people, as there always is when any subject is discussed in the newspapers, but the proportion of it is less than usual, and the controversy has opened the eyes of thousands to the mischief which is being done under the name of "restoration." If every stone of Peterborough Cathedral be made as new as the front of St. Alban's, the fight will not have been fought in vain. But we are not without hope even yet that the Dean and Chapter may reconsider their position and may pause before entering upon a work the cost of which they have not now the funds to meet, and the public are not in the humour to find for them. Again, too, there are beginning to be heard ominous mutterings about the state of things which leaves a priceless national monument in the uncontrolled power of five clergymen who may be quite unable to understand its value and importance. And any flagrant abuse of that power is certain to be brought under notice of Parliament, perhaps with results which others besides the Dean and Chapter of Peterborough may deplore.

THE RAEBURN BYRON.

Athenæum Club.

I really cannot allow Mr. Ichenhäuser to shelter himself in a cloud of pointless witticisms. Fortunately the matter at issue is extremely simple. On or about October 10th that renowned art collector informed a journalist—with a view to world-wide trumpeting—that he possessed a portrait of Byron at the age of seventeen, painted by the great Sir Henry Raeburn. Now facts are stubborn things, and cannot be disposed of as easily as so-called "Byron relics." In my letter to the Athenæum (November 21st, 1896) I pointed out the inherent improbability of any such portrait having been painted by Raeburn, without, of course, presuming to criticize the merits of the painting itself, which had been removed to America for sale purposes. It may be a genuine Raeburn for all I know or care, but it most certainly is not a portrait of Byron at the age of seventeen nor at any other age. If Mr. Ichenhäuser has himself been deceived, I am very sorry for him, although it is difficult to imagine a gentleman of his attainments—an art collector of such eminence—being bamboozled by a mere frame with "endearing inscriptions."

Truth told, my protest was kindly meant. It was an attempt to serve the public and Mr. Ichenhäuser. There are shoals of so-called Byron portraits in the market at the present time. They do not all claim to be originals—some are modest enough to pose as copies—but they, one and all, claim to be veritable likenesses of the poet at one period or another of his life. Now, in point of fact, there are very few genuine portraits of Byron extant, and those portraits are well and widely known. Mr. John Murray, Lord Lovelace, Lord Leigh, Mr. Webb of Newstead, the Lady Dorchester, the Lady Burdett-Coutts, Mr. Alfred Morrison, Mr. Horace Kent, and the heirs of the Hon. Mrs. Leigh are, I believe, the sole possessors of portraits taken from the life in oils and in water colours. If any other portraits exist, their habitation should be made known. Supposing, for the sake of argument, that we admit the genuineness of Mr. Ichenhäuser's Raeburn Byron, I marvel that it should have been taken to America. There are many persons in England who would have given a great deal of money for that conjunction of immortal names. But a pedigree would have to be produced, and many little statements sifted before the sale. Portraits of celebrated men, by painters of Raeburn's eminence, do not emerge from an obscurity of ninety years without causing something like a "sensation." For the sake of Mr. Ichenhäuser's professional reputation as a connoisseur it would be well for him to bring his precious Byron back to England, where (if genuine) it will abide for ever.

THE NEW GALLERY.—WINTER EXHIBITION.
MR. WATTS'S PICTURES.

More than one hundred and fifty examples of Mr. Watts's art, sculptures as well as paintings, are to be seen in the New Gallery; nevertheless, the collection does not begin with the beginning of his career, although the earliest work on the walls dates from 1834, and it was not till 1837 that he sent his first contributions to the Royal Academy, which were hung by that body when it held its first exhibition in Trafalgar Square. They consisted of two portraits of young ladies and 'The Wounded Heron,' No. 3 in this gallery. The earliest finished picture before us is No. 7, a small half-length figure of Mr. James Weale; it was painted somewhere about 1835, and is extremely interesting because, despite a certain timidity and heaviness of handling, it displays uncommon insight into the character of the sitter, firmness in the modelling, and distinct promise that the artist, who was not more than eighteen years old at the time, would become a good colourist of the school of Titian. No. 2, an unfinished, but, to our taste, a far better instance, is a very expressive and beautiful portrait of the artist himself "at the age of eighteen," the Catalogue says, while adding that it dates from 1834. The discrepancies of the dates are not so important as the differences of the works, which seem to indicate that No. 7 is an older example than No. 2, for the style of the latter is broader and less timid, and is certainly symptomatic of a freer and more confident mood. The earliest exhibited painting before us is The Wounded Heron (3), a group of birds, which in its firmness and spirited touch is not unworthy of a long-practised hand. From the time it was at the Academy the artist has never been long absent from the public eye, having exhibited, all told, more than 270 pictures in London alone. The present, too, is the third large collection of his works that has been formed in the metropolis, and there was also a numerous one some years ago made in Liverpool. It is clear, therefore, that not only does our painter not fear the test involved in submitting to the public a large number of one man's works, but that the public appreciates such an exhibition of the works of one who, despite the great distinction he enjoys as a portraitist, has always declared that he "paints ideas, not objects." The fact is, however, that, although his portraits yield to none in veracity and in modesty of style and execution, they embody ideas. It is not inconsistent with this that a certain deficiency in what may be called fibre should rarely be quite absent from even the best of Mr. Watts's likenesses of men; when women are in question no lack of sentiment, beauty, or grace is felt. None of the old masters, in fact, has surpassed him in depicting ladies.

But is this collection complete, and therefore thoroughly representative? It is not to be forgotten that, although few men have excelled Mr. Watts as a draughtsman, none of his numerous drawings appears in it. It comprises what is relatively but a small part of his output, either in portraits or in those painted ideas which he takes it to be his duty to produce, although, we are sorry to say, the public does not agree with him in so thinking. His sculptures, which include equestrian statues of the heroic size and in a most heroic mood, are represented by only one bust. Even among the portraits we miss the likenesses of many famous men posterity will be grateful for, among them being the best portraits ever painted of Browning, of Henry Taylor, of Guizot, of Mill, Lord Shaftesbury, Lord Dufferin, Lord Lytton, and Lord Sherbrooke, of Mr. Lecky, of Mr. Calderon, and others still living, and, among women, of the late Marchioness of Waterford and the living Mrs. Langtry.

We may pass on to notice the other pictures which on technical or personal grounds deserve attention. To this treatment of the subject, the arrangement of the works, which is, on the whole, more or less chronological, lends itself fairly well. No work in the South Room is so interesting on its own account as the before-mentioned No. 2, which is described as a likeness of the artist, for it is treated with rare breadth, and a silveriness not common in his later days. Its softness and the clearness of the shadow through which the refined and thoughtful features are seen, are quite charming, and we notice a strong likeness to Keats when a few years older. A sincere enthusiasm pervades the expression, and adds greatly to the attractions of the picture. Of 'The Wounded Heron's' history we have already spoken. Technically it proves that the painter's hand had in the three years that had elapsed between its execution and that of this portrait acquired additional firmness and precision. The Saxon Sentinels (4), two figures, larger than life, may technically be said to herald the development of a stately sort of conventional art, distinctly academical, and akin rather to the Bolognese School than the combination of Venetian and Veronese art on which the repute of the artist now rests. The colour of this work glows, and its style is grandiose, but it is incapable of moving us.

The draughtsmanship shows that when Mr. Watts painted the very striking, but unfinished portrait of Lady Lilford (8) he had not studied the Elgin Marbles in vain; and in its painting and the massiveness of its modelling, always a great point with Mr. Watts, there is not a little which reminds us of Reynolds's manipulation. The lady's head and the fine moulding of her features must have been instructive to an artist who was bent on developing his power to deal with style.

In design and coloration the whole-length, life-size portrait of Mrs Nassau Senior (11) is, comparatively speaking, one of Mr. Watts's weakest works. It will be remembered that this lady was Millais's model for the fair matron, in the famous picture of 'The Rescue,' who kneels on the staircase and takes her two half-clad children from the fireman who had saved them. The splendour of her golden tresses attracted both artists. 'The Rescue' and this portrait were executed at about the same time, i. e., in 1855; but Millais improved the lady's features, which Mr. Watts did not. She died but a few years since. Lady Holland (12) was painted in Italy, while the artist was being warmly befriended by that eminent leader of society. It not only suggests the effect of the brilliant sunlight of the Riviera, but is the Lady Holland of 1843 to the life. In fact, she thought so much of her protégé's work that, years after, she bequeathed it to the Prince of Wales. The three-quarters-length, life-size J. Joachim (14), playing a violin, is one of Mr. Watts's most masculine portraits, dark and somewhat "sunken," as artists say (a circumstance most easily remedied), but, like the better-known contemporaneous portrait of Panizzi, in excellent condition.

No. 15 is one of the best, if not the very best of the portraits of Tennyson. It was executed in 1859, and is a masterpiece of flesh painting as well as a perfect likeness. Una and the Red Cross Knight (16) is one of the happiest of Mr. Watts's romantic pictures. But charming as its grace, movement, and bright colouring are, they rather diminish its virility and spontaneity; in these respects it resembles The Childhood of Jupiter (60), When Poverty comes in at the Window (70), Britomart and her Nurse (98), and one or two more of his illustrative and anecdotic pictures—not of the allegories, which belong to quite a different category. Miss May Prinsep's portrait (21) is pearl-like in colour and delightful in its sweetness and purity; while, painted thirty years ago, the highly finished and thoroughly natural likeness of the present Earl of Carlisle (33), then Mr. George Howard, is an exceptionally good example of a manner of painting Mr. Watts seldom adopts. It has not, we think, been exhibited before.

NOTES FROM ATHENS.

Among the archæological excavations of the last month those at Corinth and the islands of Thera and Melos deserve especial notice. Of a city like Corinth, well known for its riches and brilliancy, which only received a temporary check by its destruction at the hands of Mummius, and was restored by Julius Cæsar to new life and something of its ancient glory as Colonia Laus Julia Corinthus, there was, it is admitted, little left. The existence of the city in the Middle Ages, the misery and repeated plundering, which culminated in the disastrous domination of the Turks, and finally the frequent earthquakes, all contributed gradually to destroy the relics of antiquity. The well-known ruins of an old Dorian temple with monolith pillars and the remains of the amphitheatre outside the old city were the only remnants of early date. But the old ruins were hardly in better preservation at the end of the seventeenth and beginning of the eighteenth century, as we gather from the official records of the Venetian archives. Only the amphitheatre was in comparatively better preservation than at present, as can be seen from the report which Francesco Grimani, "Provveditor General dell' armi in Regno," sent from Corinth to the Senate on September 25th, 1700, in which he proposed to employ the old amphitheatre as a lazaretto for the plague then prevalent in the district. This report, together with the accompanying drawing, was published in 1877 in the Mittheilungen des k. deutschen archäolog. Inst. Meanwhile, as the newcity occupied the site of old Corinth, more extended excavations, with the view of bringing to light the existing relics, were not to be thought of. But after an earthquake in 1857 had completely destroyed old Corinth, new Corinth by a law of May 22nd in the same year was built 6 kilomètres to the north-east of the old city, and old Corinth was gradually transformed into a decaying village, which at the last census in 1889 only numbered 883 inhabitants. This desertion gave a much freer hand to the advocates of systematic excavation. Such investigations have now been undertaken by the American School here, under the direction of Prof. Rufus Richardson, and the first results were important enough to encourage wider operations.

It goes without saying that Pausanias here, as in all such cases, is the best guide to the scrutiny of the old ground, although his topographical description is not sufficiently clear. Pausanias starts from Cenchreæ, the harbour in the Saronic Gulf, proceeds along the road to Corinth, glances at the monuments there, and then describes the group of temples situated in the market. Then he follows the street which leads to the other harbour, Lechæum, on the Corinthian Gulf, and mentions also other monuments which were in any way connected with those to be found in this direction, but otherwise scattered about the city. Lastly, he gives a long description of the extant monuments, following the road that leads from the market to Sicyon, and passes the temple of Minerva Chalinitis and the group of monuments which are near it on his way to the Acro-corinthus. Keeping this route of Pausanias properly in mind, we see clearly that, with the exception of the monuments scattered about the city, which our guide only mentions casually and out of their place in his walk through the Lechæum Street, all the rest are described in groups. One succeeds another; we need only fix the chief directions and find some of the chief remnants to reconstruct the whole plan of the ground and discover all the monuments, if they are still in existence. When, therefore, the American spade hit on the theatre at the first attempt the discovery was important. This theatre has been excavated to the depth of 22 ft. The discovery, of which there are at present only few details to hand, is not only interesting in itself, but will serve to divulge the other buildings, which still lie underground and undiscovered. It is noticeable that merely the stone supports of the rows of seats survive from Greek times, and a Roman theatre of later date has been built on the same site. With this discovery, however, are connected two others, which will give secure indications for further excavation. A Greek portico 109 ft. long has been discovered, and at a depth of about 7 mètres a carefully plastered street has been laid open for about 17 mètres. A number of very deep springs were discovered at the same time. Among the antiquities of importance discovered is a large vase of burnt earth, which has been put together out of several pieces.

The results up to now belong only to the excavations which have been made. Negotiations between the American School and the Greek Government have ended in an arrangement to buy the fields and hand them over to the archæologists, who will make a systematic and regular excavation. The agreement as to the contents will be that of the French Government concerning Delphi. In accordance with the terms of this convention the ground will, in a short time from the present day, be purchased, and the excavations again begun. I hope that the indefatigable American investigators, both by the publication of their present results and a speedy extension of the range of their fortunate finds, will increase the store of our knowledge of the topography and monuments of Corinth. In my next letter I shall deal with the excavations at Thera and Melos.

Fine-Art Gossip.

The private view of the Winter Exhibition of the Royal Academy, consisting exclusively of works by Lord Leighton, is appointed for to-day (Saturday); the public will be admitted on Monday next.

The admirers of W. J. Müller and others who, though displeased by the mannerisms of his painting, yet enjoy the brightness of his effects, the sparkle of his coloration, and the extreme cleverness of his composition, to say nothing of his distinction as the finest of the scenic landscapists of our time, will be gratified by a visit or two to the Corporation Art Gallery at Birmingham, in which nearly two hundred of Müller's productions of all sorts and subjects have been collected. They comprise, with hardly an exception, the most attractive, characteristic, and popular of the painter's works. The illustrated catalogue of them is, in its way, a desirable possession.

A marble bust of the Very Rev. Joseph Hirst is to be placed, as a memorial of that distinguished archæologist, in the library of Ratcliffe College, Leicester, of which he was president. The Ratcliffian Association has given 50*l.* towards the expense; the new Bishop of London, Earl Percy, Lord Arundell of Wardour, Lord Gerard, Mr. E. Bellasis (Lancaster Herald), and Mr. Hellier Gosselin have also contributed. Subscriptions may be sent to the Rev. A. Emery at the College.

The Landscape Exhibition of the current season in the Dudley Gallery comprises works by Messrs. R. W. Allan, J. S. Hill, H. McLachlan, A. D. Peppercorn, L. Thomson, and E. A. Waterlow.

We regret to learn that there has been risk of the destruction of the beauty of that very fine house, the British Embassy in the Faubourg St. Honoré, Paris, by the raising of the roofs of the wings en-avant-corps on either side of the gate, for the purpose of putting an additional story above the present chancellerie, and one to match it on the other side of the court. More room is said to be needed; but, if so, it would be wise to gain it by boarding-out the consulate rather than by adding a story to buildings which will not, architecturally speaking, bear an increase of height. If the intention to spoil the Embassy be not abandoned, attention will be called to the matter in Parliament on the vote for diplomatic buildings and on that for the salary of the Chief Commissioner of Works.

Numerous and urgent complaints having been made of the essay which precedes the catalogue of the current exhibition of the Society of Painters in Water Colours, the Committee has withdrawn it from circulation.

The Swiss papers record the death of Prof. Ernst Gladbach, of Zurich, on December 26th, in his eighty-fourth year. He was born at Darmstadt, and was Hessian State architect from 1840 to 1857, when he was called to the Chair of Architecture in Zurich, which he held until his retirement in 1890. He is known for his writings on the history and construction of buildings in wood, especially by his 'Holzarchitektur der Schweiz,' which has passed through two edition).

La Chronique des Arts announces that the Paris Salon will be opened this year, for the last time in the Champs Élysées, on April 20th instead of May 1st. It will be closed on June 8th. Pictures intended for this Salon must be delivered at the Palais de l'Industrie between March 5th and 10th, sculpture between the 23rd and 27th, and architectural works on the 28th or 29th.

MUSIC

Life and Letters of Sir Charles Hallé. (Smith, Elder & Co.)

This extremely interesting volume is edited by the late musician's son Mr. C. E. Halle and his daughter Miss Marie Halle, these members of his family acknowledging their indebtedness to Mr. C. L. Graves for valuable and sympathetic assistance. It may safely be said that Sir Charles Halle and Mr. August Manns have done more for music in this country during the past thirty or forty years than any other foreigners who have taken up their residence in England. The present volume begins with an autobiography, which, however, ends with 1865, after which the son takes up the record of the father's life, and ends it with tenderness and reverence. Karl Halle was born on Easter morning, April 11th, 1819, and he says that, curiously enough, Easter Day fell every eleven years on April 11th until he was fifty-five years old. Halle has much to say concerning the eminent musicians he met in Paris in his early years, among them being Spohr, Chopin, Liszt, Cherubini, Thalberg, Stephen Heller, Wagner, Berlioz, and many others of lesser note. Referring to Berlioz, he says:—

"There never lived a musician who adored his art more than did Berlioz; he was, indeed, enthusiasm personified. To hear him speak about, or rave about, a real chef-d'œuvre such as 'Ermida,' 'Iphigenia,' or the c minor Symphony was worth any performance of the same. And what a picture he was at the head of his orchestra, with his eagle face, his bushy hair, his air of command, and glowing with enthusiasm. He was the most perfect conductor that I ever set eyes upon, one who held absolute sway over his troops, and played upon them as a pianist upon the key-board."

In 1839 Stephen Heller brought to Halle's rooms in Paris a young musician named Richard Wagner:—

"We all liked him as a frank, amiable, and lively companion, modest and full of enthusiasm for all that is beautiful in art. In 1876, when I met him at Bayreuth, his first words alluded to the pleasant evenings with Heller at my rooms in Paris! What a difference there was between the man of 1839 and the man of 1876!"

The number eleven was as significant for Halle as that of thirteen was for Wagner, for he married his first wife, née Désirée Smith de Rilieu, on November 11th, 1841. In 1847 he started "concerts de musique de chambre," never before attempted in Paris; but in the following year the Revolution broke out, his pupils, save one, disappeared, and the master had to think what could be done for himself, his wife, and two small children. The scene is described briefly, but graphically, and also the wrench that he endured in leaving his beloved Paris for England in March, 1848. He says that he was far from anticipating that he would eventually feel at home in England, and be proud to become one of her citizens, and play a humble, but not unimportant part in the development of her musical taste. What great benefit Halle showered on music here there is no need to insist upon, but he is in error in saying that no record could be found of the complete performance of a Beethoven sonata in London prior to 1848. Mr. Deakin, of Birmingham, one of the most erudite of musical critics, has effectually refuted this statement, though it may have been true concerning the late John Ella's Musical Union, a group of small pianoforte pieces being, as a rule, placed at the end of the programmes. At first the stranger's pathway was hard, but gradually Halle made his way, and his account of his first experiences in Manchester, and the state of music in the centre of the cotton industry when he went there, is very amusing. Eventually, in 1858, the celebrated orchestral concerts were started, and though the outcome at first was very discouraging, appreciation gradually increased, and the Halle orchestra came into request all over the country, except in London, where efforts to establish it in favour did not win the success they deserved. This may have been partly because the conductor's beat, though by no means wanting in vigour, was too firm and rigid, so that his perfectly drilled force gave the listener the idea of military precision rather than of individual force and energy. His endeavours to popularize Beethoven's sonatas met with no want of encouragement. Not only were recitals of the entire series given year after year, first at the Hanover Square Rooms, and subsequently at St. James's Hall, but he issued an edition of these immortal works superior in note accuracy and fingering to any that had previously appeared in England, and his chamber concerts were also of the highest value from an educational point of view. Earnest as he was in the interest of what he thought was right in musical art, he was wonderfully genial as a man, abundant testimony as to this being afforded in the present volume.

Mr. Charles E. Halle speaks lovingly of his father's enormous capacity for work, his fondness for animals, his religion as a Roman Catholic, and his political opinions as a staunch Conservative, though he had a fixed repugnance for the polling booth, which he associated with the jury box, to which he was, fortunately, summoned but once in his life. He was wont, nevertheless, to say—of course in jest—that nothing would please him better than to be imprisoned as a first-class misdemeanant with a quantity of books which he never could find time to study while at large, and with access to a piano. More than two hundred pages are occupied by the letters, which are excellent reading, though they do not include the correspondence with Lady Halle, as this is to form the subject of a second volume.

THE INCORPORATED SOCIETY OF MUSICIANS.

The Twelfth Annual Conference of this Association, which seems to be steadily growing in influence for good in the art, was held at Cardiff during the past week, in the Park Hall. At the first meeting on Tuesday the secretary, Mr. E. Chadfield, read the report, which showed that the membership had undergone a steady increase, and that the income was considerably in excess of the expenditure. Mr. W. H. Cummings read a thoughtfully written paper on 'Musicial Ethics.' He contended that teachers should, if possible, confine themselves to one speciality, though in rural districts this was, of course, not always possible. He earnestly advised young musicians to avoid bogus and shady institutions, of which there were unhappily too many, and not to pay for sham titles and degrees, whether of home or foreign manufacture. Mr. Cummings also advocated general mental and physical culture, as tending to add immensely to the value of a man's musical work. In the afternoon Mr. John Thomas, the well-known harpist, read a paper on Welsh music.

On Wednesday morning the Conference was continued, Dr. Bunnett, of Norwich, reading a paper entitled 'Reminiscences of Cathedral Life during the Last Half Century.' He confined himself to Norwich. Some amusement was occasioned by the narration of the various methods by which, in past times, boys were made to open their mouths when singing. Nuts were placed between their teeth, but, as the boys promptly cracked and ate them, marbles were substituted. Spohr was so delighted with the solo singing in 1839 that he began to applaud, but soon discovered his mistake. Everything was done to make the lads good solo singers, and their general education was sadly neglected, which, of course, is not so at the present time. Dr. Bunnett maintained that the cathedral school was a fine training for a young musician, and gave many examples. Dr. C. W. Pearce subsequently read a paper on 'Free Counterpoint.' Of the remainder of the business proceedings we must speak next week.

Musical Gossip.

As already announced, the triennial Handel Festival at the Crystal Palace this year will be held somewhat earlier in June than usual, namely, on the 11th, 14th, 16th, and 18th of that month. The principal artists engaged are Mesdames Albani, Ella Russell, Clara Samuell, Nordica, Marian McKenzie, and Clara Butt, and Messrs. Lloyd, Santley, and Andrew Black.

The concerts at the Queen's Hall on Christmas Day and last Sunday afford eloquent testimony to the rapidly growing taste of the general public for good music. 'The Messiah' attracted a very large audience on Christmas afternoon, and in the evening there was a fairly large assemblage at the concert of sacred music. The afternoon concert on Saturday partook more of the nature of a ballad programme, but there were several items in the programme not unworthy of the attention of musical amateurs; and the evening Promenade Concert was of the same character as usual, including Wagner's overtures to 'Tannhäuser' and 'Die Meistersinger'; Grieg's 'Peer Gynt' Suite, No. 1; Gounod's 'Hymne à St. Cécile,' for violin, harp, and organ; and Liszt's 'Hungarian' Rhapsody, No. 4. Such musical entertainments, given at a time when the art in its loftiest phases was formerly allowed to rest, may be regarded as a sign of the times.

WE are much pleased to learn that the directors of the Royal Carl Rosa Opera Company have arranged with Mr. H. T. Brickwell to give a short season of grand opera at the Garrick Theatre, commencing on Monday, the 18th inst.

THE programme of the first Popular Concert of this year, that on Monday next, includes Tschaïkowsky's very fine Pianoforte Trio in A minor, inscribed "To the Memory of a Hero." This work, which is rarely performed, is worthy to compare with the Russian composer's 'Symphonie Pathétique.'

MR. MARCUS ALFRED SMYTHSON, for many years chorus-master of the Italian opera under Sir Michael Costa, both at Her Majesty's and Covent Garden Theatres, died on Christmas Day, at the ripe age of seventy-nine. He fulfilled similar duties under the Pyne and Harrison management, and for a time under the Carl Rosa Company. The deceased musician was well qualified for his task, and was generally esteemed in the profession.

THE Weimar Goethe-Gesellschaft has just presented a handsome Christmas gift to its members in the shape of a publication entitled 'Gedichte von Goethe in Compositionen seiner Zeitgenossen.' The collection, undertaken at the suggestion of Prof. Erich Schmidt, is prefaced by a short introduction from the pen of Hofrath Dr. Suphan, editor of the 'Schriften der Goethe-Gesellschaft,' and the musical part has been edited with preface and notes by the musical writer Dr. Max Friedlaender. The volume, issued with the assistance of Dr. C. Ruland, contains the compositions of Beethoven, Mozart, Reichardt, Schubert, Zelter, &c., and ought to be more widely known than among the limited circle of the members of the Goethe Society.

DRAMA

THE WEEK.

OLYMPIC.—'The Pilgrim's Progress,' a Mystery Play in Four Acts. Founded on John Bunyan's Immortal Allegory. By G. G. Collingham.

ADELPHI.—'All that Glitters is not Gold'; 'Black-Eyed Susan.'

MR. COLLINGHAM might have spared John Bunyan the humiliation of having his name associated with the operatic and spectacular burlesque given under the title of 'The Pilgrim's Progress.' No worse fault is to be found with the play, apart from the title assigned to it, than that it is inept and dull. With a widely different interpretation it might even have passed muster, since it is no whit sillier than a score pieces which have done much of late to fill managerial pockets. In spite, however, of the ecclesiastical incense in which a not widely dissimilar production has recently been steeped, it is a mistake to blend religious symbolism with terpsichorean revels. Especially unfair and disloyal is it to couple the name of one of the most zealous of Puritans with a species of entertainment that he would have regarded with horror and dismay. What greater abomination could Bunyan have conceived than to see his own allegorical personages masquerading with painted faces upon a booth at Vanity Fair? This species of outrage (for as such Bunyan must have counted it) is the more regrettable since it is purely gratuitous and superfluous. Except that the names of Bunyan's characters are preserved there is really nothing of Bunyan in the piece. With a view possibly of placating the censure, religious phraseology is avoided, and except the wearing by Christian of a red cross such as might be assigned a Crusader or a nurse, there is nothing to tell that the pilgrimage undertaken is from the City of Destruction to the Celestial City. With much more verisimilitude might the whole be treated as a recovered episode of the 'Morte d'Arthur.' Bunyan's hero is a man such as himself, of homely condition, oppressed with the burden of sin and flying from the wrath to come. In place of the City of Destruction we have now the Castle Joyous, in which Christian is a prince ostentatious and lavish. No burden of transgression rests on his shoulders. He starts in rich armour to go on what, though beset with dangers, is a pleasure trip; and while leaving behind him a mistress fair and princely, he indulges in all sorts of vulgar orgies. No sooner does Apollyon present himself than he is willing to take service with him, and the fiend has to be indiscreetly confidential concerning his occupations and designs to prevent him from becoming his lieutenant. The sorceries of Melusina ensnare at once his senses. The wine-cup is drained so soon as it is offered, and the painted Jezebels of Vanity Fair find him a willing captive. He is, indeed, as Byron said of himself, > —— as helpless as the devil can wish,

> And not a whit more difficult to damn
> Than is to bring to land a late-hooked fish.

This may do for Rinaldo in the garden of Armida, but to present him as Bunyan's Christian is an insult to common sense as well as literature. That Mr. Collingham has been cramped in his effort by the fear of employing Biblical language is conceivable enough. He had better have left alone a theme necessarily and obviously intractable and employed his machinery to illustrate some tale of fairy damsels and knights of Logres or of Lyonesse. His subordinate characters are of no more vitality. Death is introduced to do nothing whatever but confront for a moment Apollyon, or tell those he meets that he has no immediate occasion for them. Malignity, a species of witch, comes on for the purpose of scolding the robbers of the highway, armed with clubs, to pilfer cheese from a wench's market-basket. Nothing whatever that is done has either interest or significance, and the whole is a simple spectacle with pleasing music and lovely dresses symbolical of nothing at all. Miss Grace Hawthorne, who played Christian, mistook her powers. She smiled affably at the personages, human, celestial, or diabolical, with whom she came into contact, and was "as meek and patient as a gentle stream." Mr. Abingdon assigned some character to Apollyon, and Miss Laura Johnson declaimed with passionate vehemence as Malignity. The whole, however, claims little credit except as a pageant.

On being once more dragged to light 'All that Glitters is not Gold,' by the Mortons, proves to be entirely out of date. The same cannot quite be said of Jerrold's nautical drama, now compressed into two acts. It has a certain breeziness and vivacity. The acting of Mr. Terriss as William commended it to the public. It obtained, however, little more than a success of curiosity, and is not likely long to uphold the fortunes of the Adelphi.

Dramatic Gossip.

THE Drury Lane pantomime of 'Aladdin' is very pretty, has some delightful effects, and is quite free from vulgarity. It will shortly be humorous, but was not so at the outset. Miss Ada Blanche as Aladdin, Miss Decima Moore as the Princess, Mr. Dan Leno as Mrs. Twankay, and Mr. Herbert Campbell as Abanazar had the most prominent parts. Some conjuring performances by M. Cinquevalli were quite marvellous. An aërial troupe constituted a very attractive feature. In a day or two the entertainment will probably repay a visit.

THE improvement in the condition of Sir Henry Irving reported from the outset is maintained, but no date for the actor's reappearance is announced.

'CYMBELINE' was revived on Saturday last at the Lyceum, with Miss Julia Arthur as Imogen, Mr. Frank Cooper as Posthumus, Mr. H. Cooper Cliffe as Iachimo, and Miss Geneviève Ward as the Queen.

'THE KEY TO KING SOLOMON'S RICHES (LIMITED),' produced on Christmas Eve at the Opéra Comique, is a melodrama of the most conventional and commonplace kind, to which some scenes in Matabeleland fail to assign any novelty or significance. Miss Abbey St. Ruth, the author, took part in an interpretation nowise more remarkable than the piece.

ON Tuesday 'Betsy,' Mr. Burnand's adaptation of 'Bébé,' by MM. Hennequin and de Najac, first produced at the Criterion in August, 1879, was revived at the same house, with Miss Annie Hughes in place of Miss Lottie Venne as the seductive heroine. Mr. Welch is now the tutor.

'LOVE IN IDLENESS,' originally given a few weeks ago at Terry's Theatre, has now been revived as an afternoon entertainment at the same house, with Mr. Terry in his original part of Mortimer Pendlebury, and with Mr. Farquhar, Mr. Sydney Brough, Mr. De Lange, Miss Beatrice Ferrar, and Miss Bella Pateman still in the cast.

WITH this piece is given 'Holly Tree Inn,' an adaptation by Mrs. Oscar Beringer of Dickens's tale. The version is cleverly made, and though the proceedings of the juvenile lovers who parody the ways of their elders and elope to Gretna Green with their pockets stuffed with lollipops inspire no great measure of admiration or conviction, the whole goes with spirit, and constitutes an acceptable holiday entertainment. Miss Beatrice Ferrar, Mr. Sydney Brough, and Mr. George Belmore take part in the performance. The action is placed in the year 1820, and the costume of the time adds to the attractions of the play.

A NEW comedy, in which Mr. Charles Collette will reappear in London, is promised for the 18th inst. at the Strand Theatre.

COSMOPOLIS:

Price 2s. 6d. Monthly.

A TRI-LINGUAL AND INTERNATIONAL REVIEW.

Edited by F. ORTMANS.

The appreciative welcome given to COSMOPOLIS in the course of its first year by the press and the educated public in all countries has satisfied the Editor that this new Review meets a real want on the part of those who would follow closely the development of foreign politics and literature.

COSMOPOLIS offers its readers, in a practical form, the means of keeping themselves in touch with the literary, political, artistic, and scientific movements in foreign countries and of maintaining or completing their knowledge of the most widely known European languages.

COSMOPOLIS is composed (in equal parts) of English, French, and German Text. Arrangements are now being made for special supplements in which European languages other than those already represented in the Review shall find a place.

In each of the three languages, monthly chroniques or summaries by Mr. Henry Norman, M. F. de Pressensé, and "Ignotus" discuss, from the often divergent English, French, and German points of view, the principal events of current international politics. In other monthly or trimestrial articles, Mr. Andrew Lang, Mr. A. B. Walkley, MM. Émile Faguet, Jules Lemaître, Herrn Anton Bettelheim and Otto Neumann-Hofer take note of important literary and dramatic productions of their own countries. In addition to these chroniques, annual or bi-annual articles by competent English, French, and German critics will review (from the outsider's standpoint) the various phases of current foreign literatures.

COSMOPOLIS publishes every month a short Story in each of the three languages, as well as unpublished Memoirs, Letters, &c.

Space does not permit the mention of more than a few of the distinguished English, American, and Continental Novelists who have contributed to COSMOPOLIS in the course of 1896: Robert Louis Stevenson, Mr. Henry James, P. Maarten-Maartens, "John Oliver Hobbes," Mr. I. Zangwill, Mrs. W. K. Clifford, Mr. George Gissing; MM. Paul Bourget, Anatole France, "Gyp," Édouard Rod; Herrn Paul Heyse, Hermann Sudermann, Mme. Von Ebner-Eschenbach.

In order to give an idea of the interest and variety of the general articles on Literature, Politics, Art, Science, and Travel which have appeared in the first twelve numbers we have not space to do more than draw up the following list of some of their Authors:—Mr. Oscar Browning, Prof. Sidney Colvin, Mme. Darmesteter (Mary Robinson), Prof. Dowden, Mr. T. H. S. Escott, Mr. Edmund Gosse, Mr. Frederick Greenwood, Mr. Frederic Harrison, "Vernon Lee," Mr. D. S. MacColl, Mr. Justin McCarthy, Prof. J. P. Mahaffy, Prof. Max Müller, Mr. George Moore, Mr. G. Bernard Shaw, Mr. Geo. Wyndham; MM. Georges Brandès (who writes in French), J. Chailley-Bert, Arthur Chugnet, J. J. Jusserand, Gustave Larroumet, Paul Leroy-Beaulieu, A. Mézières, Gustave Monod, Count Léon Tolstoi, M. E. Melchior de Vogüé, Charles Yriarte, Mme. Judith Gautier, Lady Blennerhassett, Herrn Theodor Barth, Ludwig Brentano, Theodor Fontane, Herman Helferich, Max Lenz, Maurus Jókai, Theodor Mommsen, Friedrich Spielhagen, &c.

For forthcoming Numbers of the Review we have the pleasure to announce the following new Contributors:—Mr. RUDYARD KIPLING, Mrs. HUMPHRY WARD, Mr. THOMAS HARDY, Mr. ANTHONY HOPE, MM. EM. ZOLA, FRANÇOIS COPPÉE, PIERRE LOTI, ALPHONSE DAUDET, and FULDA, BJORNSTJERNE BJORNSON, &c.

JOHN FRANCIS AND THE 'ATHENÆUM.'

By JOHN C. FRANCIS.

"A fascinating page of literary history."
Illustrated London News.

"No other fifty years of English literature contain so much to interest an English reader."—Freeman.

"A mine of information on subjects connected with literature for the last fifty years."—Echo.

"Rich in literary and social interest, and afford a comprehensive survey of the intellectual progress of the nation."—Leeds Mercury.

"The entire work affords a comprehensive view of the intellectual life of the period it covers, which will be found extremely helpful by students of English literature."—Christian World.

"A worthy monument of the development of literature during the last fifty years.....The volumes contain not a little specially interesting to Scotsmen."—Scotsman.

"We have put before us a valuable collection of materials for the future history of the Victorian era of English literature."—Standard.

"The thought of compiling these volumes was a happy one, and it has been ably carried out by Mr. John C. Francis, the son of the veteran publisher."
Literary World.

"This literary chronicle of half a century must at once, or in course of a short time, take a place as a permanent work of reference."
Publishers' Circular.

"The volumes abound with curious and interesting statements, and in bringing before the public the most notable features of a distinguished journal from its infancy almost to the present hour, Mr. Francis deserves the thanks of all readers interested in literature."—Spectator.

"It was a happy thought in this age of jubilees to associate with a literary chronicle of the last fifty years a biographical sketch of the life of John Francis.....As we glance through the contents there is scarcely a page which does not induce us to stop and read about the men and events that are summoned again before us."—Western Daily Mercury.

"The book is, in fact, as it is described, a literary chronicle of the period with which it deals, and a chronicle put together with as much skill as taste and discrimination. The information given about notable people of the past is always interesting and often piquant, while it rarely fails to throw some new light on the individuality of the person to whom it refers."—Liverpool Daily Post.

A FEW WORDS ABOUT THE

BLICKENSDERFER TYPE-WRITER.

It is NOT a reproduction or hash up of any existing machines on which the patents have run out.

It is NOT an IMPROVEMENT on them.

It is an entirely new departure in Type-writer mechanism. The root idea in its construction is simplicity; in place of 2 to 3,000 parts it has only about 200. As a result of this simplicity we have a machine which is

PORTABLE (weight 6lb.), SPEEDY, DURABLE, and CHEAP.

It has a complete Key-board, with 84 Letters and Characters. It is fully warranted, and yet it is sold for £7 10*s.* NET CASH.

NEW NOVEL BY LADY VIOLET GREVILLE.

The HOME for FAILURES. In cloth gilt, 3s. 6d.

The WORLD says:—"Lady Greville's best novel is 'The Home for Failures.' It is admirable, not only for the originality of the idea and the clear and spirited character-drawing in the group of persons, but for the knowledge of people and things, the realism, the philosophy, and the feeling which find expression, frequently of an epigrammatic kind, in its pages. Everybody in the story is real."

The PALL MALL GAZETTE says:—"Lady Violet Greville has produced an eminently readable and interesting book."

A SECOND EDITION HAS BEEN IMMEDIATELY CALLED FOR OF "ALIEN'S" NEW NOVEL.

IN GOLDEN SHACKLES. In cloth gilt, 6s.

The N.B. DAILY MAIL says:—"Ralph Morton is one of the most powerfully drawn characters in modern fiction. This is a book to be carefully studied, every page bearing traces of thought and imaginative ability of the highest order."

NEW NOVEL BY FREDERIC BRETON.

The BLACK MASS. By the Author of 'God Forsaken' and 'The Trespasses of Two.' In cloth, 6s. [This day.

A NEW NOVEL BY TOM GALLON.

TATTERLEY. [Immediately.

THE COUNTESS OF MUNSTER'S NEW BOOK.

GHOSTLY TALES. In handsome cloth gilt, 6s. With numerous Full-Page Illustrations by Fred Hyland and Leigh Ellis.

A SECOND LARGE EDITION IS NOW READY OF RITA'S NEW NOVEL.

KITTY the RAG. In cloth gilt, 6s.

The STANDARD says:—"Rita is always vivacious. 'Kitty the Rag' naturally recalls its immediate predecessor, 'Peg the Rake.' Kitty is an odious little minx, but she has been drawn with considerable skill, and old Biddy Maguire is a fine specimen of the better sort of Irish peasant, honest, staunch, and warm-hearted. And there is a quite delightful vagrant whose irrelevant appearances the reader always hails with pleasure."

THE SUCCESS OF 1896.

BY MARIE CORELLI.

The MIGHTY ATOM. In handsome cloth gilt, 3s. 6d. Fourteenth Edition, completing 83,000 copies.

A SEVENTH EDITION WILL BE READY NEXT WEEK OF LITERATURE

Forty-one Years in India: from Subaltern to Commander-in-Chief. By Field-Marshal Lord Roberts of Kandahar, V.C., G.C.B. 2 vols. (Bentley & Son.)

(First Notice)

Lord Roberts forestalls and disarms criticism by expressing a hope in his modest preface that those who care to read a plain unvarnished tale of Indian life and adventure will bear in mind that the writer is a soldier and a man of action. But all due deductions being made for minor blemishes of style and language, he has written a book which will be read with eager interest if Englishmen still care for military exploits. The campaigns are related with a breadth and clearness which, in these days of lengthy despatches and cloudy writing, it is difficult to praise too highly. It would also be difficult to overstate the service which the author renders to the British nation by reminding it of the true temper and trustworthiness of one of its greatest weapons of security, the army. He makes his readers realize the worth of that portion which is recruited in India, and of the services it has rendered the empire. He brings home to them the Sepoy's patient endurance of privation and fatigue in the swamps of Burma and the snows of Afghanistan, and the steady valour displayed in many a hard-fought contest; and in our military annals there is no finer tale of devotion and courage than the story related by Lord Roberts of the native officer Subadar Ruttun Sing, who fell mortally wounded on the glacis at Delhi. The peculiar charm of the book is the modest and generous spirit which like a golden thread runs through it. The gallant author is more anxious to refresh the memory (to use Burke's phrase) of his old comrades at Delhi and Lucknow than to relate his own adventures, and he is liberal in the credit which he bestows on all who rendered him services when he commanded in the field. The perusal of the book enables the public to realize the chivalrous devotion of the soldier for "Bobs." All who have ever served under him have seen that he loves soldiers, that he respects them, and that he thinks each of them capable of being a hero. The story of his life should be studied by every young soldier, for from it he will gather that the secret of Lord Roberts's success is to be found in the care and thoroughness with which he has mastered the details and fulfilled the duties of a profession for which he has a profound love.

On the 18th of April, 1852, Frederick Roberts, having been appointed to the Bengal Artillery, arrived at Calcutta and found the headquarters of his regiment at Dum-Dum. The pestilential climate of Bengal and want of society and active work speedily affected his spirits, and young Roberts came to the conclusion that he could never be happy in India. Promotion seemed hopeless: "I was a supernumerary Second Lieutenant, and nearly every officer in the list of the Bengal Artillery had served over fifteen years as a subaltern. This stagnation extended to every branch of the Indian Army." Roberts wrote to his father, a gallant officer who had commanded a brigade in the first Afghan war, begging him to use his influence to get him sent to Burma. He replied that he expected soon to get the command of the Peshawar Division, and that he would then like his son to join him. Four months after young Roberts got his marching orders, and great was his joy. "Indeed, the idea that I was about to proceed to that grand field of soldierly activity, the North-West Frontier, and there join my father almost reconciled me to the disappointment of losing my chance of field service in Burma." Early in August Roberts left Dum-Dum for Peshawar. The journey, which now can be done in three days by rail, occupied three months. As far as Benares he "travelled in a barge towed by a steamer—a performance which took the best part of a month to accomplish." From Benares to Meerut was done in a dak-ghary, a vehicle now as extinct as the dodo. At Meerut Roberts came across for the first time the far-famed Bengal Horse Artillery.

"It certainly was a splendid service; the men were the pick of those recruited by the East India Company, they were of magnificent physique, and their uniform was singularly handsome. The jacket was much the same as that now worn by the Royal Horse Artillery, but instead of the busby they had a brass helmet covered in front with leopard skin, surmounted by a long red plume which drooped over the back like that of a French Cuirassier. This, with white buckskin breeches and long boots, completed a uniform which was one of the most picturesque and effective I have ever seen on a parade-ground."

At Meerut the metalled highway ended, and the remainder of the journey, about six hundred miles, was done in a palanquin. Early in November Roberts reached Peshawar. Born at Cawnpore and leaving India as an infant, he had enjoyed but little intercourse with his father, and they met almost as strangers.

"We did not, however, long remain so; his affectionate greeting soon put an end to any feeling of shyness on my part, and the genial and kindly spirit which enabled him to enter into and sympathize with the feelings and aspirations of men younger than himself rendered the year I spent with him at Peshawar one of the brightest and happiest of my early life."

The son bears testimony that from his father he learned much about Afghanistan and the best mode of dealing with its people, thus gaining information which proved invaluable to him when, twenty-five years later, he found himself in command of an army in that country. From his arrival at Peshawar until the autumn of 1853, Roberts acted as aide-de-camp to his father, while at the same time he did duty with the artillery. In November he got the much coveted jacket, but his joy was somewhat lessened by the fact of the troop to which he was posted being stationed at Umballa. Life on the frontier has a charm for young men of the right stuff, and Roberts did not wish to quit Peshawar. A vacancy opportunely occurred in one of the troops of horse artillery at the station, and it was given to him. The troop to which he was posted

"was composed of a magnificent body of men, nearly all Irishmen, most of whom could have lifted me up with one hand. They were fine riders, and needed to be so, for the stud-horses used for Artillery purposes at that time were not the quiet, well-broken animals of the present day. I used to try my hand at riding them all in turn, and thus learnt to understand and appreciate the amount of nerve, patience, and skill necessary to the making of a good Horse Artillery 'driver,' with the additional advantage that I was brought into constant contact with the men. It also qualified me to ride in the officers' team for the regimental brake. The brake, it must be understood, was drawn by six horses, each ridden postilion fashion by an officer."

Fond as he was of regimental life, Roberts, like all ambitious young officers, was anxious to join one of the principal departments of the army, and great was his satisfaction when he was appointed to act as a deputy-assistant-quartermaster-general. With characteristic earnestness he threw himself into his new work, and quickly won the confidence of his chiefs. John Lawrence, a shrewd judge of character, met him in camp at Rawal Pindi, and after an inspection offered him an appointment in the Public Works Department. In the chief spending department of the State his ideas would have caused an Indian Finance Minister to sigh. He would have built splendid roads and constructed magnificent bridges, but the vulgar question of cost would not have entered into his calculation. Happily he refused the offer, for it meant forsaking soldiering, and towards the end of April, 1857, he was ordered to report on the capabilities of Cherat, a hill not far from Peshawar, as a sanatorium for European soldiers. Here he first met Nicholson, who was engaged in introducing peace and order in the Peshawar Valley:—

"Nicholson impressed me more profoundly than any man I had ever met before, or have ever met since. I have never seen any one like him. He was the beau-ideal of a soldier and a gentleman. His appearance was distinguished and commanding, with a sense of power about him which to my mind was the result of his having passed so much of his life amongst the wild and lawless tribesmen, with whom his authority was supreme. Intercourse with this man amongst men made me more eager than ever to remain on the frontier, and I was seized with ambition to follow in his footsteps."

But the young soldier was not destined to remain on the frontier. Soon after his return to Peshawar the Mutiny broke out. On May 12th he was summoned to record the decisions of the council of war at which Nicholson suggested the idea of organizing a movable column to suppress the Mutiny wherever it might appear in the Punjab. The formation of the column was heartily approved by Sir John Lawrence, and carried into execution without delay. Brigadier Neville Chamberlain was appointed to command it, and he chose the future Field-Marshal for his staff officer. When Neville Chamberlain relinquished the command on proceeding to Delhi as Adjutant-General, Nicholson succeeded him, and as his staff officer Capt. Roberts had opportunities of observing closely his splendid soldierly qualities and the workings of his grand, but simple mind. "Nicholson was a born Commander," he writes, "and this was felt by every officer and man with the column before he had been amongst them many days." Capt. Roberts was at the fort of Philour when a message came from Sir Henry Barnard, who commanded at Delhi, begging that all artillery officers not doing regimental duty might be sent to Delhi, where their services were urgently required. Roberts at once felt that the message applied to him. Nicholson was loth to part with him, but he agreed that his first duty was to his regiment. At dawn next morning he left by mail-cart for Delhi. He proceeded to Umballa as fast as horses could carry him, but here a difficulty arose. He had to change mail-carts, but the seats in the fresh vehicle had been engaged some days in advance. But Roberts determined to get on "by hook or by crook," to use a classic expression from 'The Faery Queen.' He called on Douglas Forsyth, the Deputy-Commissioner, who said that he might have a seat in an extra cart that was leaving that night laden with small-arm ammunition. The offer was gladly accepted, and the journey resumed. On the evening of the 29th of June Roberts, after a narrow escape of falling into the enemy's hands, reached our piquets at Delhi. He was told that the Quartermaster-General was most anxious to keep him in his department, but a difficulty had arisen on account of the need of naming some one to help the Assistant-Adjutant-General of the Delhi Field Force, and Chamberlain had thought of him for the post:—

"I was waiting outside Sir Henry Barnard's tent, anxious to hear what decision had been come to, when two men rode up, both looking greatly fatigued and half starved; one of them being Stewart. He told me they had had a most adventurous ride; but before waiting to hear his story, I asked Norman to suggest Stewart for the new appointment—a case of one word for Stewart and two for myself, I am afraid, for I had set my heart on returning to the Quartermaster-General's department. And so it was settled, to our mutual satisfaction, Stewart becoming the D.A.A.G. of the Delhi Field Force, and I the D.A.Q.M.G. with the Artillery."

This hazardous ride was one of the most gallant feats performed during the Mutiny, and the account of it printed in the appendix should be read.

On the 30th of June the future winner of the Victoria Cross first found himself under fire, and in the hard-fought encounter on the 14th of July, while helping the artillery drivers to keep the horses quiet under an incessant fire, he suddenly felt

"a tremendous blow on my back which made me faint and sick, and I was afraid I should not be able to remain on my horse. The powerless feeling, however, passed off, and I managed to stick on until I got back to camp. I had been hit close to the spine by a bullet, and the wound would probably have been fatal but for the fact that a leather pouch for caps, which I usually wore in front near my pistol, had somehow slipped round to the back; the bullet passed through this before entering my body, and was thus prevented from penetrating very deep."

The wound, though comparatively slight, kept him on the sick list for a fortnight, and for more than a month he could not mount a horse or put on a sword. He, however, recovered in time to serve in No. 2 Battery, which was constructed immediately in front of Ludlow Castle, five hundred yards from the Cashmere Bastion. Here he had a narrow escape, being knocked down by a round shot which came through an embrasure. On the morning of the assault, being no longer required with the breaching battery, he was ordered to return to staff duty, and accordingly joined the General at Ludlow Castle. Discouraging reports were received as to the progress of the assaulting columns, and Roberts was sent to find out how far they were true:—

"Just after starting on my errand, while riding through the Kashmir gate, I observed by the side of the road a doolie, without bearers, and with evidently a wounded man inside. I dismounted to see if I could be of any use to the occupant, when I found, to my grief and consternation, that it was John Nicholson, with death written on his face. He told me that the bearers had put the doolie down and gone off to plunder; that he was in great pain, and wished to be taken to the hospital. He was lying on his back, no wound was visible, and but for the pallor of his face, always colourless, there was no sign of the agony he must have been enduring. On my expressing a hope that he was not seriously wounded, he said: 'I am dying; there is no chance for me.' The sight of that great man lying helpless and on the point of death was almost more than I could bear. Other men had daily died around me, friends and comrades had been killed beside me, but I never felt as I felt then—to lose Nicholson seemed to me at that moment to lose everything."

On the morning of the 24th of September, whilst Nicholson's funeral was taking place, Roberts marched out of Delhi with the column that was dispatched to Cawnpore.

"It was a matter of regret to me that I was unable to pay a last tribute of respect to my loved and honoured friend and Commander by following his body to the grave, but I could not leave the column."

Six-and-thirty years after, the present writer stood at the gate of the old cemetery near the Cashmere Gate, not far from the breach through which Nicholson had led his soldiers. In the dusk of the evening he saw a figure go slowly up the path leading to Nicholson's grave. The man placed a few flowers on the tomb, and remained for some minutes gazing at it. Then with quick, active steps he returned. It was Lord Roberts, who had come to pay his last tribute to his loved and honoured friend and commander. The next day the Commander-in-Chief of India left Delhi for England.

Early on the morning of the 10th of October, 1857, the column reached Agra. As the local authorities said that the enemy were nowhere in the neighbourhood, the Brigadier gave orders for the camp to be pitched as soon as the tents should arrive, and he considered (wrongly, as Lord Roberts frankly admits) there was no necessity for posting piquets until the evening. Roberts and Norman (now General Sir Henry Norman) with a few others got permission to breakfast in the fort. They had scarcely sat down when they were startled by the report of a gun, then another and another. Hurrying down the stairs, they jumped on their horses and galloped out of the fort and along the road in the direction of the firing. On reaching the scene of action a strange sight broke upon them. "Independent fights were going on all over the parade-ground. Here, a couple of Cavalry soldiers were charging each other. There, the game of bayonet versus sword was being carried on in real earnest." Roberts and Norman rode off in different directions to search for the Brigadier. While thus employed the former was stopped by a dismounted sowar,

"who danced about in front of me, waving his pagri before the eyes of my horse with one hand, and brandishing his sword with the other. I could not get the frightened animal near enough to use my sword, and my pistol (a Deane and Adams revolver), with which I tried to shoot my opponent, refused to go off, so I felt myself pretty well at his mercy, when, to my relief, I saw him fall, having been run through the body by a man of the 9th Lancers who had come to my rescue."

Gradually the enemy were beaten off, hotly pursued, and their camp captured. After a halt of three days the column continued its march, and reached Cawnpore on the 26th of October. Here we must leave for the present the story of Lord Roberts's adventures. Some of the most exciting and interesting pages remain to be noticed.

The Gospel Book of Saint Margaret. Being a Facsimile Reproduction of St. Margaret's Copy of the Gospels preserved in the Bodleian Library, Oxford. Edited by W. Forbes-Leith, S.J., F.S.A.Scot. (Edinburgh, Douglas.)

The preliminary investigation with a view to the canonization of St. Margaret may be seen in Theiner's 'Monumenta Vaticana.' According to the account written by her confessor, nearly eight hundred years ago, she "had a book of the Gospels beautifully adorned with gold and precious stones, and ornamented with the figures of the four evangelists painted and gilt." The author goes on to say that the book was accidentally dropped by the bearer as he was crossing a ford, and, after having been long sought for in vain, was at length discovered; but instead of being completely spoilt by the action of the water, it was taken out of the middle of the stream as free from damage as if the water had not touched it. Only in the outer leaves could a slight mark of damp be detected. The book was to her great joy restored to the queen, and the chronicler attributes its preservation to a miracle. The nineteenth century may be pardoned for preferring to assign its discovery and its state of preservation to natural causes, especially as it was admitted at the time that the outer leaves were not protected in the same way as the interior was. The writer's concluding words in the original are: "Quare alii videant quid inde sentiant; ego propter Reginæ venerabilis dilectionem hoc signum a Domino fuisse opinor." But though many will demur to the miraculous part of the narrative, there is no possibility of denying the truth of the story, which is contemporaneous with the event itself, and is further confirmed by the present appearance of the book after an interval of nearly eight hundred years.

What became of the book during this long period no one knows, but that the identical Gospel book of St. Margaret is now in the Bodleian Library admits of no question. Its discovery was made known to the world by an article in the Academy of August 6th, 1887, by Mr. Falconer Madan, Lecturer on Mediæval Palæography at Oxford. It was removed from a parish library at Brent Ely, in Suffolk, and sold at Sotheby's, having been entered in the catalogue as "The Four Gospels, a manuscript on vellum of the fourteenth century, illuminated in gold and colours, from the Brent Ely Library." The book was bought for the Bodleian Library for 6*l*., nobody having any suspicion of its real value. Of course, in the hands into which it came, it was easily detected, and only a few days elapsed before it was proclaimed to be the identical book of the Gospels of St. Margaret which had previously been lost and found.

There are three or four internal evidences of its ownership, two being of the sixteenth century, others of the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries. But of more importance than these is a poem of twenty-three lines in hexameter verse, which exists on a fly-leaf before the beginning of the text. Appearing to have been written at the end of the eleventh or beginning of the twelfth century, it describes the loss and subsequent discovery of the book very much as the story has been related. The verses may have been composed by Turgot, Bishop of St. Andrews, the queen's confessor, but were certainly not transcribed by him, for the scribe wrote the first three lines as prose before he discovered that they were in verse, and wrote the remaining twenty lines properly, with a capital letter at the beginning of each line.

The editor seems to us somewhat to overrate the importance of this document when he speaks of it as "a beautiful specimen of the style and ornamentation of the Canute period" (p. 7). He quotes Prof. Westwood also as saying, "The text of the MS. is written in a beautiful minuscule hand." Its chief value consists in its being the earliest extant specimen of a pre-Reformation Scottish service book; but the writing does not bear favourable comparison with either that of the Canterbury Missal or of the Missal of St. Augustine's Abbey, recently published by Mr. Martin Rule, and the Gospels have been carelessly transcribed, having about fifty mistakes of spelling, or omitting or supplying words.

It may be described generally as consisting of a selection from the Gospels of the Missals in use at that time, most of the pages being more or less illuminated with letters of gold and other colours. It is written on fine vellum, the letters on the leaf in many cases being faintly visible on the other side. On the verso of the leaf preceding each of the four Gospels is a picture of each evangelist respectively, and in the case of St. Matthew the outline of the picture is distinctly shown on the recto of the leaf, owing to the action of the water, but, strange to say, the colouring seems to have been hardly affected by it. The book begins with the first twenty-one verses of the Gospel of St. Matthew, prefaced by the words "Incipit euangelium secundum Mattheum" in vermilion (the first words of this, as well as of the other evangelists, being in large gold letters), and then proceeds to the first extract from the Sarum Gospel, beginning with "Sequentia Sancti Euangelii secundum Mattheum." But there is no other instance of a Gospel being prefaced by a "Sequentia," &c. The passages selected, with the exception of the first from each Gospel, which begins with the initial words of the Gospel, are all prefaced by the usual words, "In illo tempore." All the other Gospels, instead of having the words "Sequentia," &c., are prefaced simply by the words "Secundum Marcum," &c., in illuminated letters.

The account of the Passion is given at full length from all the four Gospels, headed in gold letters "Passio Domini nostri Jesu Christi secundum Matheum," &c., and in St. Matthew's account we have the singular reading, "Vah, qui destruit templum dei et in tribus diebus illud reaedificat?" with the same mark of interrogation which is always used for questions. This is the reading of the Codex Aureus in St. Matthew (though not that in St. Mark) as well as of other early MSS. of the Latin Gospels, and appears in the Westminster Missal lately published by the Henry Bradshaw Society. On the last page devoted to St. Matthew we have the singular mode of writing the words "Pra&imore," the & being made to do duty for the last letter of Prae and the first of timore. This is the only instance of the kind, though et in the middle or at the end of a word is frequently thus represented.

When we come to the passages selected from St. Mark, in the illuminated part of the first page we find in large gold letters "Initium Euangelium" for Initium Euangelii; and at the "Passio Domini Jesu Christi secundum Marcum," in spite of the usual commencement, "In illo tempore erat pascha et azyma," the superfluous word "autem" is inserted from the Vulgate, where liturgies usually omit it. Towards the end of the "Passio" here we have again the reading, "Vah, qui destruit templum Dei et in tribus diebus aedificat?" and this reading has not here the sanction of the Codex Aureus, but was once adopted in the original Douai version of the New Testament, although altered in subsequent editions.

In St. Luke again we have the same insertion of "autem" after "In illo tempore" in the "Passio." There is nothing else in the passages selected from St. Luke to notice, except that there are, perhaps, fewer mistakes of writing than in those of St. Mark.

When we come to St. John, the illuminated picture of the evangelist is added on one side of the vellum, with nothing on the other side. In the second Gospel we have the word "servet" written by mistake for servat in the form "serv&," and in the next page the curious appearance of the word "aeternam," written "a&'nam," whilst in the very next line the word "aeterna" is written at full length. The mistakes of the scribe in the whole four evangelists amount to about fifty, the most important, perhaps, of all being the omission of the words, in a Gospel from St. Mark, "et Maria Jacobi minoris et Joseph mater," which, if they had been inserted, would have just filled one line of the manuscript, a mistake evidently of the kind of "homœoteleuton." Amongst other mistakes there are two or three omissions of the illuminator to supply the capital letter at the beginning of a line.

The liturgical value of these extracts from the Gospels is, of course, absolutely nothing, yet as an interesting facsimile of an ancient document it will be welcome to many more than those who may be fortunate enough to possess one of the 110 copies to which the impression is limited. In the course of a few years it will probably fetch a considerable price.

It may, perhaps, be permissible to express regret at the editor having omitted the blank pages, fol. 1, 1v., 2v., 21, 30, 37v., 38, and 38v., which would have given a complete representation of the original book, with all the disfigurements of 800 years. We should then have been able to judge how far the pictures of the other evangelists had been represented on the back of the leaf, as that of St. Matthew has been.

We had hoped we should have been able to throw some light on the copy of the Gospels from which these excerpts were translated; but after comparing them with the corresponding portions of the Westminster Missal, with the Vulgate, and other published versions, and after making due allowance for what certainly are, or probably may be, mistakes of the scribe, we cannot find that this manuscript agrees with any known copy. The readings for the most part follow the Vulgate, but there are several important variations from that text. A remarkable one is the omission of the last clause of the thirty-fifth verse of the twenty-seventh chapter of St. Matthew, which appears as taken from the Vulgate in nearly every modern version, but which is undoubtedly a mere interpolation from the parallel passage in St. John's Gospel, and is absent from all the best Greek and most of the early Latin manuscripts. But perhaps the most remarkable omission is that of the name of the prophet Jeremy in the ninth verse of the same chapter, space being left for the insertion of the name. It looks as if the writer was aware of the mistaken reference, but was unwilling to substitute the name of Zechariah for that of the other prophet. It must have been a well-educated scribe who in the eleventh century could have detected the error in the reference.

Green Arras. By Laurence Housman. (Lane.)

The circle of Mr. Housman's admirers widens slowly and steadily. And to them he owes a duty—for they expect much of him, and cry their expectations from the very housetops. Much, however, as they expect from him, he from his readers expects much more. He expects them to appreciate and follow his erratic evolutions, to acquiesce in his startling conclusions, and, hardest of all, to assent to his somewhat capricious estimate of the value of words. Words are to Mr. Housman sometimes mere sensuous sound values — sometimes symbols deeply weighted, myth-laden — and often he uses them to express ideas. The unsympathetic reader stumbles blind and irritated among the wreckage of the dictionary, and only the sympathetic need hope for treasure, for to know which of the three values attaches to any word or words the reader must be intimately in key with the mood of the moment. Mr. Housman would seem to desire recognition in the character of a great master of words. Taking him in that character, and allotting to the public the part of Alice, Lewis Carroll's dialogue will be found to sketch accurately the relative positions:—

"'When I use a word,' Humpty Dumpty said, 'it means just what I choose it to mean—neither more nor less.' 'The question is,' said Alice, 'whether you can make one word mean so many different things.' 'The question is,' said Humpty Dumpty, 'which is to be master, that's all.....They've a temper some of them—particularly verbs, they're the proudest; adjectives you can do anything with, but not verbs—however, I can manage the whole lot of them! Impenetrability! That's what I say.'"

This, clearly, is what Mr. Housman says, and he, alas! is not always master; sometimes after one of his struggles with his native tongue the honours remain divided. Perhaps one of the less pleasant feelings inspired by a book which, after all, has in it much that is quite remarkable, is the feeling that much must have been dropped between the lines during the conflict between the author's sense of style and his contempt of sense.

When Mr. Housman writes, as he often does, a poem that transports us into the world of dreams, he seems to claim that the words should only just brush the senses with a surface of meanings, plausibly deep or shallow according to the reader's degree of lassitude. Thus 'The Stolen Mermaid' and 'The Water Ghosts' have phrases which almost seem, for the sake of the author's delight in mere quaint decorations, to have left concrete meaning behind them—or is this betrayal of sense by sound merely an interesting if hazardous experiment, an attempt to pull the reader, by the ear, into the mood required of him? Be this as it may, it is a method which will try even the sympathetic, and which to the unsympathetic is merely exasperating. We ourselves claim to be sympathetic. Mr. Housman has produced passages — sometimes whole poems — full of music subtle and rich, full of thought, always fine, and now and then deep and high.

The temptation of comparing Mr. Housman's work with the work of Rossetti may, for many a good year yet, be set aside. But one must remember—being forced to the remembrance by sterling qualities and strong defects—that here is work from a hand trained to express itself in two mediums, and borrowing qualities from the one for the other. Every poem or passage in which the author succeeds has the power of making us see a picture. The metaphor by which Antæus describes to his blind mother the stars reflected on the sea is striking and beautiful, however out of place in a mythological setting:—

They look, and see my Father's palaces
Shine in blue fathoms underneath the bay:
There with long wands like pilgrims enter they
And feast.

'The Gazing Faun' supplies a fine couplet, where the union of the author's two arts shows plainly:—

The playing of waters a coronal wound
Melodic with ripples and tendrils of sound.

But quotation can only do injustice to a book full of mysterious charm, and possessed by a pervading atmosphere of beauty none the less real in that it sometimes evades analysis—a book of strange virtues and defects. It reflects, we hope with the same promise of ultimate performance, the qualities which in his other art have won recognition for its author—qualities, perhaps, pointing to final mastery, but meanwhile elusive and indocile, and only very reluctantly tending to put off their waywardness. Outwardly and visibly the book is triumphant in its own type of beauty. The illustrations are as unequal as the verse, Antæus being an insult to common as well as to æsthetic sense, and 'The Three Kings' a gem of true beauty. In fine, 'Green Arras,' with all its faults and shortcomings, is the work of a poet. We cannot yet place him among the great ones, but his genius and our justice alike forbid us to class him with the crowd of minor poets who sing nowadays in thin-voiced, many-throated, weariful chorus, and to whose metric ailments one longs to offer the old prescription: "Live on sixpence a day and earn it."

A History of Dumfries and Galloway. By Sir Herbert Maxwell, Bart., M.P. "The County Histories of Scotland." (Blackwood & Sons.)

Almost, if not quite, the most original effort in history during the last twenty years was a twelfth century biographical study in which the value, picturesque and human, of charter evidence was illustrated with unmatched force. What is true on the high scale holds equally in the story of a parish or a shire, and the like standards of test apply in the criticism. Sir Herbert Maxwell's style is so direct, clear, and natural that with a stock of patience he could have produced a model county history; he has all the necessary sympathies—the pity is he has not the patience. Whoever writes South Scottish annals without laborious use of the Rotuli Scotiæ, the Exchequer Rolls, and the Great Seal Register essays a perilous adventure. History without charters is but writ in sand. Sir Herbert's easy chapters exemplify what can be done by leaving the chief printed records (except Mr. Bain's invaluable calendars) practically out of account. Although Dumfries is first on the title-page, the stress is on Galloway. Probably the publishers are answerable for coupling two irreconcilables with little except a boundary line in common. The author himself is responsible for a much heavier percentage of error than is excusable in one of a standard series so important. It is not merely that a vast body of necessary information is absent which ought to have been compactly summarized. It is too evident that the omissions are explained by a harder word than "forgetfulness." For instance, it is stated that Kirkcudbright, the capital of Eastern Galloway, first became a royal burgh in 1455. It was a royal burgh under David II. After this one need not wonder that the charter stories of Sanquhar and Annan have no mention in spite of the light they cast on the influence of war and rebellion on burghal fortunes. The constitutional side has no charm for a writer who perpetually falls out of his line of march to pick up some Gaelic etymology—worth a pin's fee usually or less. A weighty problem of that sort he is apt to ignore. The odds are considerable that it will be news to him that Galloway as a bishopric contained three deaneries: the Desnes, the Farnes or Farinnes, and the Rhynns—all names in need of rational definition. The fondness for Gaelic speculation might have led to conclusions on Celticism in Galloway; on the clan system, can, caupes, sorryn, and fachalos; on "the office of Tochiadarroche in Niddisdale"; and on kindly tenancy. Such themes are unknown here, and when a rare piece of racial evidence comes up it passes unrecognized. Thus Amulliekyn, a seventeenth century surname, is misconstrued into Irish O'Mulligan, whereas it appears in Galloway as Ap Molegan in the Ragman Roll, and is of prime moment as a Welsh or Cymric name-form in the district in the thirteenth century. In the adaptation of Skene's 'Celtic Scotland' to Galloway the conclusions have not been submitted to adequate local test.

Most old canons change, but to tell the facts remains for historians. Here, unfortunately, inaccuracy is everywhere. Sulwath, not "Sulwe," is the typical form of the primitive Solway, which Sir Herbert has not discovered was a ford. "Yry, yry, Standard," was not an English war-cry in 1138; it was a taunt to Galwegians afterwards. "Flores' History" is a unique method of citing a Rolls series volume, and one that tells its own tale. Skene wrote 'Flores Hist.,' an abbreviation recognizable by the tyro as 'Flores Historiarum.' Sir Herbert, borrowing as his manner is, makes the reference ostensibly his own, and in the process corrects Skene by deforming the transformed "Flores" into a personal name! Two invasions of England in 1173 and 1174 are rolled into one. Gilbert of Galloway did not pay his 1,000*l.* indemnity. The presence of Alan, Constable of Scotland, at Runnymede is called "an example how strangely the allegiance of the Scottish magnates was divided." Sir Herbert has forgotten that the Scottish king himself actively sided with the barons, and that Magna Charta contained a clause for his benefit. Bardonan, said to have been in Galloway, was according to the Great Seal Register in (Dalton parish) Dumfriesshire. The Scottish hostages of Edward I. in 1297 did not die in Lochmaben Castle, which was not then a "terrible fortress": they died in Carlisle. Sir Herbert has not considered the contemporary statement that Edward took Lochmaben Castle in 1298. He has devoted some space to Edward's Scottish campaign of 1300, and says that Annandale was laid waste and Galloway spared. There appears to have been no such devastation. Mr. Bain's calendar might have prevented the continued suggestion that the garrison of captured Carlaverock were hanged. Edward did not hang the constable; it is not likely he would hang any of the others. Sir Herbert is under the strange impression that the elaborate supplies for that invasion were of local production. That he possesses small acquaintance with the Wardrobe Accounts cited is seen from his silence about the fortification of Dumfries, and his failure to grasp the plan of the expedition, or observe the presence of an English fleet in Kirkcudbright Bay. Edward, he says, after the delivery of the Pope's bull to him in the last days of August, remained in Dumfries until the end of October. In fact, he was in Cumberland by September 2nd, army and all.

Independent generalizations scarcely exist in the book; the omissions are vital; wherever there is detail there is blunder. Palgrave would have yielded a valuable list of forfeitures of patriots by Edward I. The grant of so great a fief as Annandale to the De Bohun family is amongst the things about which one wonders how they could possibly have been left out. It curiously resulted in the concurrent running for about three quarters of a century of an English and a Scottish title, complicated by a Balliol grant to Percy, between whom and De Bohun there was litigation over the right.

Has Sir Herbert devoted ten minutes' investigation to the McKie, Murdoch, and McLurg legend about a hassock of land in Minnigaff granted by Bruce, "so 'tis said," and divided betwixt the three heroes of the long bow? Is it rash to suggest that, after Bruce's time, before the Murdochs in Cumloden there were McKies, and that before McLurgs in Kirouchtie there were Herons? If these inferences from the Great Seal be facts, what becomes of the fair tradition of the widow's three archer-sons who mysteriously managed to acquire three separate surnames, without Christian prefixes? Such tales ought not to pass for ever as history, unsifted. Perhaps this one has as much verity as there is in Sir Herbert's date of 1570 for the New Wark of Dumfries, a building named in 1506, or in that of the battle of Annan on Christmas Eve, 1332, which actually took place on December 16th. Edward III. did not grant a manor to Sir Eustace Maxwell in 1335, he only promised one, and Sir Eustace went back to the Scottish faith soon afterwards. Sir Herbert's entire failure to catch the sense of the Balliol period is seen in his capital omission to observe and record that the effective movement to throw off the Balliol-English yoke in the south was native to Dumfriesshire, where William of Carruthers rose about 1335. Not less disastrous is the absence of references, even at second hand, to the great body of documents on the occupancy by the English of their chief castle of Lochmaben, and their minor forts in Dumfriesshire and Galloway. When Sir Herbert finds time to glance at the Rotuli Scotiæ he will find some really interesting things there.

Sir James Lindsay could not have been murdered in June, 1356; at any rate, he was alive, as was his murderer, in the autumn of 1357. Regarding the Stewartry of Kirkcudbright, the distinctive title of Galloway on this side Cree, it is really amusing to see that Sir Herbert has yet to discover that, coeval if not far older, there was a Stewartry of Annandale as well, which lived on until the present century. We are by no means satisfied with Sir Herbert's account of the Gallovidian Stewartry, dating it categorically from 1372. It certainly was called a bailiary in 1426 and a constabulary in 1429, although the bailie of 1426 was steward in 1429. The murder of the Tutor of Bomby does not rest on Pitscottie's authority: Buchanan mentions it. The story of the battle of Kirtle in 1484 loses immensely because the narrator knows nothing of the charters behind, which so dramatically illumine the last stand of the Douglases. In 1488 the battle of Sauchie is unrecorded, although the long spears and wild shout of the Dumfriesshire men determined the fate of James III. Relative to the clan fight of Maxwell and Johnstone in 1593, Sir Herbert has a startling ascription, citing the 'Lads of Wamphray' as "Scott's spirited ballad." He says no punishment followed on Lord Maxwell's burning of Dalfibble. It was one of the two charges on which he was beheaded. The other was the murder of Sir James Johnstone in 1608, the last atrocity of a long feud. The late Mr. William McDowall —whose work on the burgh of Dumfries is one of the half dozen really first-class performances in local Scottish history, and whose labours Sir Herbert has often used with the scantest recognition — somehow overlooked the exact scene of that famous assassination, effected at a meeting ostensibly for a reconciliation. Sir William Fraser, writing after Mr. McDowall, has the same oversight. Sir Herbert — really copying, though professedly quoting original authority — of course follows. The fatal tryst was held on the slope of Auchnane, in Tinwald parish, a bold ridge, visible from the Caledonian Railway, six miles west of Lockerbie. The Murder Loch near by preserves, no doubt, a record of the crime.

The list of errors noted on a single perusal is yet far from ended, but Sir Herbert must be weary of correction. So are we. For anybody not primarily concerned to obtain authoritative historical information the book will be bright and readable, a not ineffective general survey of a long period of provincial history, with many biographical characterizations and stirring episodes vigorously written. Its utter inadequacy in knowledge of records, however, to say nothing of its besetting inexactness, unfits it from seriously ranking as a standard county history. The bibliography is useful, though far from complete. The old maps from Blaeu's atlas and the modern one by Bartholomew are most serviceable and excellent in their several kinds.

The Life of Thomas Hutchinson. By James K. Hosmer. (Boston, U.S., Houghton, Mifflin & Co.)

The last royal Governor of Massachusetts Bay was one of the great Americans of the old colonial days. His 'Diary and Letters,' of which the first volume appeared in 1883 and the last in 1886, revealed the man to the world and heightened the respect entertained for his memory. His 'Life,' as now written by Mr. Hosmer, is not a mere compilation from the 'Diary.' The author has drawn upon the archives of Massachusetts for unpublished letters and details, and has used his material in a judicial spirit, which some of his countrymen will condemn as unpatriotic, but which entitles him to the esteem as a biographer and historian which the late Francis Parkman earned and received.

Hutchinson's education was begun at a grammar school in Boston, continued at Harvard University, and completed after he became M.A., when he set himself to the careful study of Latin and French. His bent was to historical writing, and he set himself in early life to collect books for that history of Massachusetts which constitutes one of his best titles to honour and remembrance. His father was a merchant, and he learned in his father's counting-house the details of business and the means whereby to make himself independent in fortune.

Having a turn for public life, he was elected by his fellow burgesses, in 1737, to represent them in the House of Assembly, and his first duty in that position was to draw up an address congratulating George II. on having returned from Germany in safety, despite the famous storm recorded by Lord Hervey. He inspired confidence in his financial capacity. A boundary dispute between Massachusetts Bay and New Hampshire requiring settlement in England, he was deputed in 1740 to cross the ocean, and he returned home, after thirteen months' absence, as the successful advocate of his native colony. In 1749 he was Speaker of the House. The colony was then suffering from a paper currency. The sound sense and tact of Hutchinson were exercised to restore specie payments and prosperity. His zeal for the public service was rewarded with threats to burn down his house. When everything worked smoothly he was popular; till then, however, those who believed that the shortest cut to wealth was to issue paper money had opposed and reviled him. Mr. Hosmer justly remarks that "democracies never appear to so poor advantage as in the management of finances, and no more conspicuous instance in point can be cited than that of provincial New England throughout the first half of the eighteenth century." His statement might be illustrated and enforced by instances of a later date in American annals. He is not unmindful, indeed, of modern history when he remarks concerning the Writs of Assistance, against which Otis thundered, that "freedom, to be sure, was outraged when a customs officer invaded a man's house, his castle; but high tariffs cannot exist without outrages on freedom."

The passing of the Stamp Act was the measure which led to the independence of the United States. It was not to the taste of Hutchinson, yet he was unprepared or disinclined to oppose in an official capacity anything which had received legislative sanction. Mr. Hosmer is both full and candid in his comments. He points out that George Grenville was most conciliatory. The outlay for the American civil and military establishments had risen from 70,000*l.* to 350,000*l.* a year. He thought that America should contribute something. He stated the case to the agents for the chief colonies and expressed his readiness to adopt an alternative scheme. Mr. Hosmer points out that if some representation in Parliament had been allotted to America, no dispute about taxation would have occurred. Such a scheme had been suggested by Franklin; Otis had favoured it in New England; Adam Smith advocated it, and Grenville did not oppose it. Two men in America—Patrick Henry, of Virginia, and Samuel Adams, of Massachusetts—had set their hearts from the outset upon the severance of the colonies from the motherland, and their voices prevailed.

The position of Hutchinson was most trying. He objected alike to revolution and tyranny. Perhaps he saw too clearly that the question at issue had two sides. A letter written to Col. Williams on the 26th of April, 1765, reveals his character:—

"As for those men you talk of and wish for, they are only to be found in Plato's Commonwealth. We that fancy we are most like them, although we durst not pursue any measure which appears to us to be against the public good, yet we see many things through a false medium, and are balanced, though insensibly, by one prejudice and another. Perhaps the case is the same with some who are opposite to us in public affairs, who vote quite different from us, and are under insensible bias the other way. This consideration should tend to keep us from discontent and disturbance in our minds when measures are pursued contrary to what appears to us to be right. Possibly we may be mistaken."

In the summer of this same year Hutchinson's house at Milton was attacked by a mob, the furniture was destroyed, the manuscripts which he had been collecting for thirty years were scattered or destroyed, and he narrowly escaped with his life. His only offence was to doubt the wisdom of those who were openly preparing the way for rebellion and revolution. He was then Chief Justice; he afterwards became first deputy and next Governor of Massachusetts Bay. In May, 1774, he embarked for England, having been temporarily superseded by General Gage. The king desired to learn from his lips the story of Boston. He died in London on the 3rd of June, 1780, at a time when a mob ravaged the City and destroyed the dwelling and papers of a greater Chief Justice than the first historian and last royal Governor of New England.

Mr. Hosmer writes with a moderation which inspires confidence in his judgment. His references to the chief points in dispute are in very good taste. The policy of sending two regiments to keep the peace in Boston was entirely mistaken; but justice has been withheld from the soldiers, and he adds this tribute to the regiments concerned, which does as much credit to himself as to them:—

"Few organizations of the British army have a record more honourable. The 14th [now the Yorkshire Regiment] was with William III. in Flanders; it formed, too, one of the squares at Waterloo, breasting for hours the charge of the French Cuirassiers until it had nearly melted away. The 29th [now the Worcestershire Regiment] was with Marlborough at Ramilies; with Wellington in the Peninsula it bore a heavy part, as may be read in Napier, in wresting Spain from the grasp of Napoleon. A mistaken policy had put the regiments into a position where they deserved pity; to fight it out with the mob no doubt would have been far easier and pleasanter than to yield. For brave soldiers to forbear is harder than to charge, and one may be sure that, in the long history of those regiments, few experiences more trying came to pass than those of the Boston streets."

The particulars in this work which now appear for the first time complete the picture of the last royal Governor, who was not the least worthy of the natives of New England. Mr. Hosmer has executed his work so well that it is a model for his countrymen and deserves the careful study of our own.

NEW NOVELS.

Cursed by a Fortune. By G. Manville Fenn. (White & Co.)

SINCE the days of the ill-starred Clarissa, few heroines have had to undergo a persecution so audacious as Kate Wilton, the heiress in Mr. Fenn's last novel. First urged by an impecunious uncle, a so-called "squire," and his wife to endow with her hand their oaf of a son, then rescued through her bedroom window by a persuasive middle-aged attorney, she is imprisoned by that eminent gentleman in his house in Bloomsbury, and finally nearly loses her life by the drugs administered to her for the basest of purposes. Fortunately the oaf, who undergoes a Cymon-like transformation of character through his attachment to another maiden, and a gallant young doctor, who is only deterred by Kate's wealth from declaring his virtuous passion, arrive in the nick of time for her rescue and the physical doubling-up of the limb of the law. The dialogue and characters are, for the most part, heartily vulgar, and of psychological interest there is little or none; but it will be imagined that in the author's practised hands there is no lack of incident, and the story runs unflaggingly from start to finish. We much prefer Mr. Fenn in his Christmas vein, but if he must attempt fiction for adults, this is not the worst of his enterprises.

The Juggler and the Soul. By Helen Mathers. (Skeffington & Son.)

"To be the little wife of a great man" was, in the opinion of Miss Mathers's heroine Ninga, "infinitely preferable to being the great, or say notorious, wife of a little one." It is sad that a young lady of such admirable sentiments should be tortured through her innocent affections by the fate which subjects her to the consequences of an unhappy scientific experiment. Mr. Sabine is a great surgical genius and discoverer, and has succeeded in reanimating the actually dead by transfusion of the blood of the living. It is to his care that Ninga is entrusted by her father, an absentee in India, and in his household she soon reigns over the hearts not only of its master, but of his two pupils, the buoyant, generous Arthur and his dark, saturnine comrade Jasper, a man of more years and strange experience of the magical systems of the East. When readers find, as they do almost at the outset, that the savant himself is the secret object of Ninga's attachment, but that his age and modesty prevent his understanding her heart, they are prepared for a triangular complication that promises not too smooth a course for youthful passion. But the terrific surgical secret that Sabine shares with his one deaf-mute assistant constitutes an element in the case that removes it from all ordinary experience. Miss Mathers utilizes this unholy power in a startling, but not inconceivable manner in her story, to which we refer our readers not only for its blood-curdling qualities, but for the very womanly study of the Anglo-Indian maiden, whose final happiness will be found an actual relief.

Dorothy Lucas. By Edgar D. C. Bolland. (Digby, Long & Co.)

MR. BOLLAND'S story belongs to a fast vanishing class of fiction, in which there is invariably a baronet, and he, as invariably, a betrayer of youth and innocence. In this case we prefer to substitute "ignorance" for "innocence," since we cannot admit that a young lady who lies to her parents, and whose instinct does not warn her against meeting a man of doubtful reputation at a restaurant, is possessed of the latter quality. In fact, we consider Dorothy a vain and vulgar little person, quite on a level with her parentage. The jeune premier of artistic temperament is another familiar type, as is the Dissenting minister with his regrettable lack of principle. Finally, there is the deus ex machinâ, John Wilson, who rescues the maiden in distress, and sets everybody right without apparent effort. From these elements the author has produced a not very well-written story, which the reader will feel might have been less readable had it also been less commonplace.

The Gleaming Dawn. By James Baker. (Chapman & Hall.)

A NOVEL dealing with the Hussite (Mr. Baker prefers Husite) wars in Bohemia is indeed a novelty. The author interests his readers deeply in Zizka, Prokop, Magister Payne, and other Bohemians who took prominent part in the national movement following the treacherous execution of John Hus at Constance, and readers of Count Lützow's recently published monograph on Bohemian history, noticed by us on September 19th, 1896, will recognize many familiar names both of people and places. A revival of interest in the history of the Hussites is appropriate. As Mr. Baker points out, the doctrines of Wyclif showed more vitality among the Hussites of Bohemia than among the Lollards of England. So in his excellent and interesting romance 'The Gleaming Dawn' the reader is introduced to a little body of Wyclifites in England and at Oxford, and soon accompanies them to Bohemia to fight against the Papists for faith and freedom. It will strike even the casual reader as extraordinary that this novel should show not only exciting scenes, but great accuracy of detail. The mere mention on p. 73 of the English Bible in Prague alone involves no little historical knowledge and research. The reference is quite exact and chronological. As a romance of the early part of the fifteenth century, Mr. Baker's novel deserves to rank high. He has a good story to tell, he writes well, and there is no cessation of the reader's interest in the events narrated. The worst line of the book is the first, which is a marvel of cacophony—"Will the world ever wot aught of all the wild fury," &c. Otherwise the book is essentially good literature throughout.

A Tale of the Thames. By J. Ashby-Sterry. (Bliss, Sands & Co.)

It is pleasant in winter to read of the sunny days of July on the Thames and of the love-makings of two young couples, "illustrated," as the author expresses it, with lyrics of his own composition. The story and its incidents are cleverly designed as a setting to Mr. Ashby-Sterry's bright and graceful verses. One of his dramatis personæ well recalls Mortimer Collins's poems of the Thames, which are too seldom read to-day. 'A Tale of the Thames,' though short and slight, is eminently pleasant to read, and not a page of it is disappointing. Mr. W. Hatherell's drawings in black and white are good, and form an agreeable accompaniment to Mr. Ashby-Sterry's literature.

A Mere Pug. By Nemo. (Digby, Long & Co.)

It is possible to imagine the existence of persons who can enjoy a story narrated by a pug to a "delicate little terrier." The example of Ouida's 'Puck' does not suffice to justify an unsuccessful attempt of a somewhat similar description. The writer has a story to tell and there is some pathos in it; but in the case of 'A Mere Pug' the effort is hopeless from the start.

FAIRY TALES.

There is something pleasantly novel in Eileen's Journey, by Mr. E. A. Jelf (Murray), for, as the author writes, "it is a magic journey, in which she travels through the centuries as mortals travel through space." Her progression is, of course, backwards. The journey is "made in search of beauty and goodness," and "the thread of a single fairy tale—with a single governing idea—is woven through the whole." The thread is, however, very thin, for, though Eileen is "personally conducted" by Queen Titania in a fairy chariot borne by eaglets to a magic train which carries her into the past, there is no fairy tale at all. We grieve to say, too, that Mr. Jelf has had to go back all but forty years to find any "scene" of sufficient beauty or goodness to justify his heroine's leaving the train to see it. She then alights at Station A.D. 1857, and witnesses the siege and relief of Lucknow, which are well described. Of course, to see many of the striking events of history completely, weeks, months, and sometimes years, were required, and while Eileen was at Lucknow time went on; but at last she returned to Station 1857, and once more sped backward in the century till she reached Station 1845, when she alighted in the frigid zone on the deck of the Erebus to be present at the death of Sir John Franklin. To make the balance true, she visited the torrid zone at the moment when Livingstone was in the clutch of the lion. After this she was at the Duchess of Richmond's ball before Quatre Bras, saw the beginning of the War of Independence and Shakspeare at the Globe, sailed with Columbus, and was present at the martyrdom of the Maid of Orleans and the first meeting of Dante and Beatrice; she even saw Tell shoot his arrow, though the legend is now discredited. Mr. Jelf's book will certainly be popular with children, and will stimulate their love of reading.

In The Garden of Peace, by Helen Milman (Mrs. Caldwell Crofton) (Lane), "Fortune brings in some boats that are not steered." Were it otherwise Mrs. Crofton's garden of peace might have caused her dire distress, for, as she relates, she and her husband went into the country to try to find a house, and found a garden which they loved and a sundial which sealed their fate. "It was only a glance," she writes, "but our hearts took root in a moment.....And the house? It was enough that it was trellised and covered with creepers; we gave it hardly a glance, for we looked into the garden, and beyond the garden down into the valley, and to the fir woods where a glint of pale larch green and rose-tints told us the news that Spring was coming, and that the earth was awakening from her sleep. We listened to the birds, and they gave us welcome." "Nature," however, as we know on high authority, "never did betray the heart that loved her," and all went well. No lack of care was shown in choosing boxes in which birds of all kinds could dwell comfortably; and these were soon filled, even though their inmates were subjected daily to having their roofs lifted up. The book is full of interesting observations on the ways of birds and beasts, which would have been more valuable had we known the district in which they were made. The writing, though sometimes very good, is unequal.

We own to a preference for stories which, like The Saga of the Sea Swallow, by Miss (?) Maidie Dickson (Innes), begin with "Once upon a time." There is a pleasant sense that we are going to hear of "Old, forgotten, far-off things"; and though "Saga" is rather a big word to use, Miss Dickson by no means disappoints this expectation. Seven Vikings, with names often heard in story, are on their way back to Norway in a ship laden with booty, when, somewhere on the west coast of Britain, they run on a rock and spring a leak in their vessel. They make for an islet which is little more than a great black rock with a castle on it; but in this castle is, of course, a beautiful princess, and she can change herself at will into a sea swallow. Her story is interesting, and a number of well-known legends have contributed to its existence. In 'Greenfeather the Changeling' Miss Dickson is on ground with which she is more familiar. The scene is laid in a village within easy access of fairyland. Village life in Ireland is well described, and court life in fairyland is picturesque.

Holiday Tasks (Jarrold & Sons) has a business-like sound, but Miss M. H. Debenham's title is misleading. The holiday folk are a chance group of health seekers met together on the shores of the Mediterranean, and the task which they set each other is "to make up a real good fairy tale and tell it." They all have wits, and they all succeed, and the result is a charming collection of wondrous tales, which is sure to be popular.

The Garden of Time (Jarrold & Sons), by Mrs. G. Davidson, is a kind of fairy tale. It is the chronicle of the adventures of little Daffodil, who sets out with her poodle Koko to pay a visit to Father Time. On the way she makes the acquaintance of Jack Frost, the Tombscratcher, the Sundog, the Man in the Moon, and other well-known characters, who say and do appropriate things like good puppets. Time's garden being reached, Daffodil "passes through the veil of memory into the vista of years," and then awakes, for lo! it was a dream. Children have strange tastes and some may like this strange story, which is adorned with many weird pictures.

AFRICAN PHILOLOGY.

The S.P.C.K. send a book of easy reading lessons (Masomo Mepesi) in Swahili, beginning with short sentences and gradually progressing to connected stories. From the same publishers comes a Swahili version (abbreviated and adapted) of 'Some Chief Truths of Religion,' by the Rev. E. L. Cutts, under the title Mambo mangine mangine makuu ya dini. Both these little books are printed at the Universities' Mission Press, Zanzibar, and should be found very useful in the schools connected with that mission.

We have also received from the S.P.C.K. Kafa ka Malen ka Atra Temne, a book of hymns in Temne, compiled by J. Manka and the Rev. J. A. Alley, who are the authors or translators of a considerable number of the hymns. The Temne language is largely spoken in the "Hinterland" of Sierra Leone, and is the one most needed by C.M.S. missionaries working there. Cust, following F. Müller, places it (along with Bullom, Mende, Susu, Mandingo, Wolof, and others) in the northern section of the Atlantic sub-group of his Negro group. This group must be looked on as merely a provisional one for the reception of languages whose relations to one another and to other groups have yet to be determined. Bleek and Lepsius were inclined to think that the "Negro" languages would ultimately be found to possess Bantu affinities. The principal authority for this language is the German missionary Schlencker (died 1880), who published a Temne grammar and dictionary, and a 'Collection of Temne Fables, Traditions, and Proverbs' (Trübner), and translated the greater part of the Bible into Temne.

The Cambridge University Press has issued a handsome quarto—Specimens of Hausa Literature, by Charles Henry Robinson, of Trinity College, Student of the Hausa Association. This book is the outcome of a movement on the part of the University which will be warmly welcomed by all students of language, and will, we hope, in time embrace other African language-groups. The MSS. from which the "Specimens" are printed were collected in Africa by Mr. Robinson and his brother, the late Rev. J. A. Robinson. The text is printed in Roman characters, with a literal English translation on the opposite page, and followed (in this edition) by facsimiles of the originals written in the Arabic character. The Hausa language is believed to be spoken by fifteen millions of people, and is, moreover, the language of trade throughout the Central Soudan, i.e., the region surrounding Lake Tchad. Perhaps Mr. Robinson's estimate of its importance and interest is excessive; he thinks it is one of the four languages which will ultimately dominate the continent of Africa, the others being English, Swahili, and Arabic; but something must be allowed for the feeling of proprietorship acquired by the scholar who explores a little-known subject. We could name individuals who would probably make similar claims on behalf of Fiote, Mang'anja, or any tongue of which they have made a dictionary. Hausa has incorporated a large number of Arabic words, and, apart from these, shows certain Semitic affinities. Mr. Robinson, however, thinks that it should rather be classed with the Hamitic group, though avowing that he does not know enough of either Coptic or Berber to make a satisfactory comparison with those languages. He does not mention the classification of F. Müller, who places it among the "Negro" tongues. Its position can hardly be determined without further study, to which end the publication of these specimens and of the grammar and dictionary promised shortly should be of great assistance. They consist of six poems of a gnomic and theological character, and an historical extract translated from the Arabic. Some parts of the poems are rhymed, others seem to follow no recognizable arrangement of endings. The religion depicted is of the fanatical type exemplified in the Soudan dervishes and the Emir Danfodio, the prophet of the Niger. A great part of Poem F is devoted to the life after death, and the torments allotted to unbelievers and evil-doers (for the poet's morality is of an exceedingly practical character, and among those whom he denounces are the "whisperers of evil," the "brokers who have made unjust profits," and "they who regard stealing as lawful") are described in exceedingly drastic language. The author of this and the preceding piece is one Sheikh Othman of Sokoto, who died in 1809, and appears to have been the apostle of Islam among the Hausas. A few of his lines will serve as a specimen of the general tone of the poems in their less ferocious mood :—

Leave off pride and evil-doing, and stealing earnest-money; count thy cowries full, leave off falsehood.
The Mussulman who loves his brother shall share the abode of Mohammed, son of Amina.
Pay attention and listen to my words, O Mussulmans; that which has been said is true.
If then you refuse to repent (or) even to listen, when you have to rise (and leave this world), there will be no continuance for any one.
If the King of the Mussulmans goes to Mecca, we must pray and make ready our goods (to go with him).
Our belief is to us in the place of riches; we cleanse our hearts, we repent well.
We pray that our Lord may give us power that we may rise up among all the followers of Abd-el-Kadr.

AMERICAN FICTION.

The Story of Aaron. By Joel Chandler Harris. (Osgood, McIlvaine & Co.)—"The story of how Buster John, Sweetest Susan, and Drusilla found their way into Mr. Thimblefinger's queer country has," says the author of 'Uncle Remus,' "been set forth," but this is the story of Aaron, who was foreman of the field hands on their father's plantation in Middle Georgia. What was more important still, he was acquainted with the language of birds and beasts, and with other mightier secrets. "If you want to learn this language," said Mr. Rabbit, "go to Aaron, Son of Ben Ali, take him by his left hand, bend the thumb back, and with your right forefinger make a cross mark on it. Should Aaron pay no attention to it, repeat the sign. The third time he will know it." At that time the children's minds were too full of other things to care about Aaron; but after a while they remembered what Mr. Rabbit had said, and sought Aaron, and the result is this book. But what magician ever yet yielded to the first attempt to win his secrets from him? As North-Country children say, "the third time is catchy time," and on the third trial Aaron yielded, and taught them how to converse with all the birds of the air and beasts of the field. Horses black and grey begin a story which is continued by the "track dog" and the white pig; but we are bound to say that we think the children must sometimes have found it a little tedious. The part we like best is that which tells of the rescue of the Teacher, and of his reappearance when "the army marches by." That is very good. The illustrations are good, too.

Chumley's Post: a Story of the Pawnee Trail, by Mr. William O. Stoddard (Nimmo), may be described as an American version of 'Robbery under Arms,' minus the literary flavour and go-ahead vigour of that spirited romance. Jerry M'Cord, alias Mortimer Herries, is its "Captain Starlight," for the astute black-fellow we have the wily Pawnee, and horses instead of oxen are the object of their joint depredations. It is a faithful enough presentment of the wild drama of the Western frontier, so far as its actors and incidents are concerned; the noble red man appears in his proper guise of a thief and an assassin, with none of the glamour that used formerly to be thrown around his proceedings; and the different types of pioneer settlers are evidently sketched from life. Yet the whole is lacking in the touch of genius with which "Rolf Boldrewood" handled these well-worn materials; the action drags, and the reader's attention is diverted by unnecessary details, which weary without convincing him. Chumley, who disguises the more aristocratic form of his patronymic as above, is a fine figure of a man, and is worthy of so plucky and winsome a mate as Jessie Munro; but the development of their love-affair is a desperately long business, and it requires the dogged persistence of the British schoolboy to travel to the conclusion thereof along the Pawnee trail. A word of praise must be given to Mr. C. H. Stephens's capital illustrations.

For Freedom's Sake. By Arthur Paterson. (Osgood, McIlvaine & Co.)—Mr. Paterson has, when he pleases, a stirring enough manner of telling an adventurous tale. 'For Freedom's Sake' is good, though the author may not be quite so much in vein as he has been at other times, and doubtless will be again. His present story is of the Abolitionist troubles in 1856 and the attitude assumed by some of the men of Kansas versus Missourians, who sought in too practical a way to enforce their views on the slave question. The scene is laid in a small frontier town called Santone. Saving the presence of Mr. Paterson's hero, it is old John Brown himself who is the hero of the hour. The doings of himself, his stalwart sons and followers, make a good background for Robert Holdenough, and are, indeed, the principal interest. Side issues and complications of various sorts set in at Santone. There is a moderate or peace party, who count their own safety and interest above the great principles involved in the skirmishes between the Missourians and the men of the North. The Southerners are many of them bullies and desperadoes working in the interest of their cotton lords. On the top of these undercurrents and confused elements arrives Robert Holdenough, of Boston, to take up land, but still more to uphold the cause of freedom. At this point the story opens. He identifies himself with John Brown's cause, which produces friction with peace-loving relatives of the girl of his heart. There are many ups and downs and some exciting episodes. Mr. Paterson by no means wallows in Americanisms. He only introduces what is necessary for the sake of local reality and vividness of impression.

The Maker of Moons, by Mr. Robert W. Chambers (Putnam's Sons), and the other stories contained in this volume, show the hand of a clever and practised writer, of more repute in the United States than in Europe. Mr. Chambers collects eight stories (the first of which supplies the title) abounding in adventure, excitement, tragedy, and horrors. For those who like such disturbing elements in combination these tales should have considerable attraction. There is hardly a restful page in the book. Nevertheless the writer's skill is undeniable. Everything in these stories is American, including humour, pathos, phraseology, and spelling. The author is no doubt a keen sportsman, and his experiences as a fisherman are among the best passages in the book. We will give no account of the plots of his eight short stories, beyond saying that they are never dull and always original and varied.

The Daughter of Alouette. By Mary A. Owen. (Methuen & Co.)—The North American Indians of the Missouri district and the white settlers in that inclement region have provided Miss Owen with material for a picturesque and dramatic treatment of the contrast between wild and civilized life existing almost side by side in the Far West. The story is full of incident and vivid colour; whether it is locally accurate or not cannot be pronounced by, nor need it signify to, the English reader.

Readers who knew their New York City in the days of Irish liberators and before the Tammany gang was broken up will understand what in The Dragon Slayer, by Mr. Roger Pocock (Chapman & Hall), may seem to others obscure. In any case it is a curious story; it is curiously expressed, and is, besides, a quaint mixture of actuality and allegory. If it please him, the reader may set the symbolism on one side and "go" for the story itself. Even then he will think it a somewhat strange production, full of surprising people and startling events. Brand, the hero, an honest journalist (this is not a contradiction in terms, as it appears to be), represents the spirit of truth and unselfishness warring with the elements of a corrupt civilization and national dishonour manifested in the person of a great financier. Hilda, the heroine, stands for ideal humanity rescued from the perils of gigantic self-interest and unscrupulous scheming. The world's great frauds, started in high places by notable personages, are shown up, and their mysterious emissaries tracked out and unmasked by the powers of righteousness and the courage of a trio of social reformers.

LAW-BOOKS.

Guide to the Mining Laws of the World. By Oswald Walmesley, of Lincoln's Inn. (Eyre & Spottiswoode.)—The idea of this book is a good one, and not so quixotic as some might imagine, for note the author's statement at p. 15 that nearly every country, except our own, has a mining code of some sort or other. To give some idea of the codes of other countries, and of the codeless condition of our free and happy England, is the task which Mr. Walmesley has taken upon himself, and, as far as we can judge without a personal investigation of all the mines of the world, he has produced a very useful and instructive manual. The number of countries, divisions of countries, colonies, and other political units of which he treats is nearly one hundred, beginning very properly with his native country, and ending with Japan. The plan of the work, as described in the introduction, may be thus stated in a greatly abridged form: the author gives, first, in the case of each country or other division, the legislative features and history of the law; secondly, the classification of minerals; thirdly, the rights of search for mines; fourthly, the rules as to concessions; fifthly, the rules as to acquirement of easements of way and water, &c.; sixthly, the rules as to inspection; seventhly, the arrangements for relief in case of accidents; eighthly, the constitution of the mining authority where such authority exists; ninthly, general observations where required. To collect and digest such a mass of information must have been a work of great labour, and it may be hoped that the wide scope of the book will ensure its circulation and secure for the author his due reward. It is impossible, within our limited space, to give any general idea of so many-sided a subject, and we must be content to notice one or two interesting points here and there. A curious contrast is drawn between codeless England, "with her annual production of nearly 200,000,000 tons of coal, and huge quantities of other minerals," and little Lucca, with only one mine of silver lead and one of lignite, and an elaborate mining code of 115 articles! It may be noted, however, that while the author, quite correctly, calls Lucca "a small province within a state," it is not so very long since she lost her independence. A remarkable instance of excessive codification is afforded by the Argentine Republic, where, we are told, the premature efforts of the legislature have caused "much confusion and impediment to a proper development of the mines." It seems clear that China and Japan have a great mining future before them, and that both countries have laid down rules of law on the subject of minerals. The vast extent of China involves too great a variety of law and custom for collection and treatment in detail in the small work under notice, but Mr. Walmesley states the general principles, extracted from a native treatise with the marvellous title of 'Kin-Ting Ta-Tsing Hoy-tien Tze-ri.' The mineral wealth of Japan is said to be "something enormous," the gold, silver, copper, iron, and coal, in certain parts, appearing to be "almost inexhaustible," while manganese, sulphur, and petroleum are also produced. An excellent set of rules seems to have been laid down, but it is only of recent origin, for, in the words of Mr. Walmesley, the history of the written mining law of Japan may be said to date from the "Restoration" in 1868. As regards our own benighted land, the book contains some very interesting particulars. Although (as mentioned before) there is no general code for the country, there are bodies of law or custom which regulate mining in particular parts, notably in the Forest of Dean, and the "Peak" and some other parts of Derbyshire. These are summarized in the "Great Britain" chapter of the work; it is impossible to go into such matters here, though the quaint terms "free miner," "gaveller," "meer," "freeing dish," "lot," "cope," "bar-master," &c., are enough to whet the curiosity even of a moderately inquisitive person. For these and other matters we must refer to the book itself, which, apart from its qualities as a law-book, must necessarily have attractions for all who are interested in any way in the progress of mining industry. The index is excellent.

The Magistrate's Annual Practice for 1895. By Charles Milner Atkinson. (Stevens & Sons.)—The great success of the Chancery 'Annual Practice' must naturally have suggested the publication of similar works dealing with other jurisdictions; and the duties and powers of a magistrate are so multifarious that Mr. Atkinson's book must be most acceptable, not only to that class, but also to the many solicitors and the sprinkling of barristers who practise before them. From the date of the preface, "October, 1895," and from the fact that the appendix includes portions of several Acts passed in 1895, we conclude that the work was prepared during the session of Parliament which terminated in that year, and that the words "last session of Parliament" in the preface apply to that of 1894–5. That being so, and many decisions of the courts during the year 1895 being cited, the practitioner will be fully armed for legal conflict according to recent judicial and legislative declarations of law. The author regrets that he has felt himself compelled, by considerations of space, to omit some important subjects, such as the Factory and Merchant Shipping Acts, and we share his feeling; but the book is so ponderous, even without them, that we can easily understand his having decided to exclude them. We may, perhaps, suggest that a second appendix, containing alphabetical tables of the penalties under those and some other Acts (e.g., the Shop Hours Act), with references to Act and section in each case, would assist the many who will use the book, and could not increase its bulk very much.

A Manual of the Principles of Equity. By John Indermaur. Third Edition. (Barber.)—This useful and compendious treatise, originally published in 1886, is too well known, now that it has fought its way to a third edition, to require a lengthy notice at our hands. The appearance of the second edition about four years ago constituted in itself a survival of the fit which proved that Mr. Indermaur had found an appreciative audience. The present edition has its raison d'être principally in the necessity of incorporating in all works on equity the provisions of the Trustee Act, 1893, 56 & 57 Vict., c. 53. This enactment now constitutes the statute law as to trustees. Many of its sections are mere re-enactments of those of earlier Acts, which it so far repeals; but even where it exactly copies its predecessors it necessarily vitiates the references given in previous editions of the work; and it is probable that it may have introduced new rules here and there, notwithstanding that it is simply called "an Act to consolidate." On comparing Mr. Indermaur's statements of the various sections with the sections themselves in the Queen's printers' copy we find that the reproduction is generally very accurate, but one or two little slips may be pointed out. The statement of the section as to appointment of new trustees (p. 58) fails to include absence from the United Kingdom for more than twelve months as one of the circumstances which may justify such appointment. This is a rather serious omission; the Conveyancing and Law of Property Act, 1881, introduced the provision as to such absence for very good reasons, and a practical lawyer must know that the remedy thus provided may obviate grave inconvenience. At p. 59 the fact that the consent of co-trustees, &c., to the discharge of a trustee (when no new trustee is appointed) must be by deed is not noticed, though it is correctly stated that the declaration of a desire to be discharged, and the actual discharge itself, must be by deed. At p. 61 the statement, "A trustee has now full power to give proper receipts for all trust moneys and property of every description," is so general as to be scarcely intelligible; the section referred to (s. 20) deals with a "receipt in writing" of a trustee "for any money, securities, or other personal property or effects payable, transferable, or deliverable to him under any trust or power." In the same page s. 21 is rather loosely set forth, and it would have been better to give the actual words of the legislature. In extenuation of such defects as these, Mr. Indermaur may, perhaps, urge that no sensible and lawyerlike reader would rely on the mere statement of a section in a text-book without looking at the section itself. That is very true; but, then, why does Mr. Indermaur himself often refer to other works (e.g., Underhill, 'Law of Trusts and Trustees') instead of finding out and referring to the decisions or statutes on which the authors of those works rely? In the case of Roman law we are obliged very often to treat the views of individual authors as our ultima ratio, because we find little else to go upon; in English law, where every result is recorded, there is no excuse for quoting Mr. A. or Mr. B. without finding out whether he relies on authority or merely states his own opinion. But we have now "growled" enough. A carefully prepared corrigenda sheet might sweep away all defects. We may conscientiously recommend the work, even as it stands, both to students, for whom it is primarily intended, and to barristers and solicitors who desire to make a preliminary survey before sinking shafts in the rich ore-bearing strata of deep legal investigation.

DICTIONARIES.

FLÜGEL is a familiar name to most Englishmen who have taken up the study of German, and therefore we thank Messrs. Asher for having brought out in two handsome volumes a new Dictionary of the English and German Languages, founded on Flügel by Dr. I. Schmidt and Dr. G. Tanger. Of course, as in all dictionaries "made in Germany," the aim is rather to help the industrious Teuton to learn English than the less persevering Englishman to master German; but the German-English part of the work seems to us useful and well arranged, although a little more consideration might have been paid to the fact that many English still study German not with a view to trade, but to be able to read German literature. However, it is a decided advance upon Flügel, and the handsome pages and clear type reflect much credit on the publishers.

We have received several more parts (ten in all) of the Nuovo Dizionario Italiano-Tedesco e Tedesco-Italiano of Messrs. Rigutini and Bulle (Leipzig, Tauchnitz). The Italian-German portion of this lexicon is finished, and the German-Italian has begun. The former seems to be excellent so far as it goes. The particles especially, to which ordinary dictionaries pay too little attention, are well and clearly explained. The tenses of defective verbs are also plainly stated, and this, again, is a decided advantage. This is a dictionary much to be recommended.

The fifth edition of Meyer's Konversations-Lexikon (Leipzig, Bibliographisches Institut) proceeds prosperously on its way. The thirteenth volume begins with the North Sea (Noordzee) Canal, and reaches as far as "Politesse." An excellent plan of Nuremberg occurs early in the volume; and admirable geological and agricultural plans, as well as a territorial map and a series of historical maps, and a plate of "Länderwappen," illustrate the article on Austria. When would a London publisher think of introducing so many useful illustrations in an encyclopædia? Photography is also capitally elucidated, and the short articles on palæography and Palestine deserve praise; and there is a good sketch of the history of Poland, with maps illustrating the boundaries of that unfortunate kingdom before its unscrupulous neighbours parcelled it out among them. The little history of philology on pp. 850–52 is exceedingly well done. Conington has, we may remark, been turned into "Cunington," but that is a solitary misprint. The article "Pferd" is also a careful piece of work.

OUR LIBRARY TABLE.

THE title of Alone in China, and other Stories (Osgood, McIlvaine & Co.), is a little puzzling. Mr. Julian Ralph travelled in China, but not alone, and it is impossible to find in the stories which he appends to his personal adventures any one so solitary as to answer the description on the title-page. But the nearest approach is probably the heroine of the first story. This lady was an American heiress who fell in love with a member of the Chinese Legation at Washington, and, in spite of her father's protests, insisted on marrying the wily Oriental. The story is not a pleasant one, and the author describes the bride as submitting to indignities which it is difficult to imagine any American lady would endure for a moment. On the voyage out she discovered that her husband was bringing with him a Frenchwoman as his second wife, and though holding aloof from this very inconvenient fellow traveller, she failed to make the protests which might have been expected of her. The same relations between the three were continued in China, and after many vicissitudes and one attempt to run away, the American wife settled down in her Chinese home, and became essentially Chinese. There is an unreality about the story which detracts from its interest, and it is humiliating even to be told of a Western lady submitting to form one of such a conglomerate household as that of Mr. Tieh. The first portion of the work contains an interesting and well-written account of the author's experiences in China. Together with Mr. Weldon he engaged a houseboat, and made a number of expeditions on the rivers of the central provinces. He was evidently determined to look on the bright side of everything in China; the scenery of the plains was in his eyes delightful, the villages were charming, the people good-natured and obliging, and the dinners cooked for him by his Chinese chef were equal to anything to be got at the Trois Frères. This is the spirit in which he took up his pen; but the stern realities interfered considerably with these roseate views. He found that the people everywhere "either frowned or grinned at" him, that the beggars were supreme in their impudence, that most people tried to cheat him, and that he was unable to believe a single word spoken by his attendant. But in spite of these inconsistencies, his account of his voyages is pleasantly written, and with the exception of some Transatlantic expressions, the literary style is all that could be desired. His description of Mr. Weldon, after having stumbled on a dead man, as going "about all the rest of the day with his entire complexion turned inside out," is neither graphic nor amusing; and the use of such a word as "brainiest" for cleverest is certainly not to be commended. The stories in the later part of the volume, more especially the fairy tales, are characteristic and well told, and the work throughout is admirably illustrated by Mr. Weldon.

Wit, Wisdom, and Folly (Digby, Long & Co.) has been sent to us in two bindings. The title of Mr. J. V. Marmery's volume had rather led us to expect some brilliant latter-day epigrams or another Nietzsche; but the author has merely collected a series of ana, many of which are good reading, and retold them with local colour (warranted to be wholesome) or a reflective background. This rather spoils their point, and gives the book the tone of 'The World of Moral and Religious Anecdote.'

The Civilisation of our Day (Sampson Low), edited by J. Samuelson, is a series of essays by "expert writers" on the great advances in culture of all sorts achieved by the nineteenth century. The subject is a very large one, and the present volume, although writers of undoubted authority contribute to it, suffers from compression of space. Some of the unsigned articles seem hardly up to the standard of expert knowledge; others of considerable interest scarcely cover the proposed subject; e. g., the essay entitled 'The Dawn of Reason in Religion' is chiefly occupied by the story of the publication of the Vedas and the Parliament of Religions at Chicago. The maps and statistics appended are striking.

MESSRS. KEGAN PAUL & Co. have published a new edition of The Silence of Dean Maitland, with illustrations by Mr. Hamilton Jackson. —Miss Edgeworth's Belinda has been added by Messrs. Macmillan to their "Illustrated Standard Novels." The brief introduction by Mrs. Thackeray Ritchie is pleasant reading, and Miss Chris Hammond's illustrations are excellent. —Messrs. Routledge have issued yet another volume of their edition of Marryat's novels, containing The Pirate and The Three Cutters. Mr. Courtney supplies a sensible introduction.

MESSRS. GIBBINGS & Co. have reissued The Pilgrim's Progress, with C. H. Bennett's illustrations. — Messrs. Chapman & Hall have certainly done a marvellous feat in publishing The Pickwick Papers and Martin Chuzzlewit, well bound in cloth, at a shilling each.

THAT excellent periodical the Journal of Education (Rice) has reached its eighteenth volume, and does Mr. Storr credit by the knowledge and good sense it displays.

MESSRS. MCCORQUODALE & Co. have sent us The Railway Diary for 1897.

WE have received the catalogues of Mr. Baker (ecclesiastical), Mr. Higham, and Mr. Hollings (good). We have also a catalogue from Mr. Downing and Mr. Thistlewood of Birmingham, Messrs. Bright of Bournemouth, Messrs. Deighton & Bell of Cambridge (good), two catalogues from Mr. Clay (general and chemical works) and one from Mr. Thin of Edinburgh, Mr. Milligan of Leeds, and Mr. Ward of Richmond (engravings and books, good). Mr. Rosenthal has sent us a catalogue of rare books from Munich, and Mr. Hoepli of Milan an elaborate book-catalogue of his publications.

WE have on our table A Hero of the Dark Continent, Memoir of Rev. William Affleck Scott, by W. H. Rankine (Blackwood),—The Golden Readers, Standard I. (Moffatt & Paige),—Elementary Solid Geometry and Mensuration, by H. D. Thompson (Macmillan),—The X Ray, or Photography of the Invisible, by W. J. Morton and E. W. Hammer (Simpkin),—Auto-Cars, by D. Farman, translated from the French by L. Serraillier (Whittaker),—The Earth and its Story, by A. Heilprin (Gay & Bird),—"Carriages without Horses Shall Go," by A. R. Sennett (Whittaker),—Transactions of the Royal Historical Society, New Series, Vol. X. (Longmans), —A Text-Book of Nursing, by C. S. Weeks-Shaw, edited by W. J. Radford (Arnold),—The Crystal City under the Sea, translated from the French of A. Laurie by L. A. Smith (Low),—When Arnold Comes Home, by Mary E. Mann (Henry),—The Piebald Horse, and other Stories, by A. Burrell (Fisher Unwin),—Immensee, from the German of T. Storm (Glasgow, Gowans & Gray),—The Haunted Manor House, and other Tales, by Author of 'A Flight to Florida' (Skeffington),—King for a Summer, by E. INDIAN PROBLEMS.

Ashcroft, Petersfield, Dec. 28, 1896.

WILL you allow me to point out that in your review of my third Indian problem 'Backwards or Forwards?' you misstate my views with regard to India's real scientific frontier? The three problems must be taken as a whole, and in the first I have laid down a plan for the defence of the North-West Frontier which includes all the places which you accuse me of wishing to abandon.

I must also ask leave to support my opinion that Russia would not dare to weaken her hold on the Caucasus in time of war, in opposition to your view that that province must be regarded as a bulwark of her empire, by reminding you that, in consequence of its disturbed state, its garrison has quite recently been increased by over 18,000 men.

Neither can I be shaken in my belief that Tiflis is the natural base of an expedition having India for its object by your remark that it would have the Caspian between it and India, for this is equally true of Astrakhan at the mouth of the Volga, where troops and stores would have to be transhipped into sea-going vessels, the Volga itself being always closed in winter by ice. That the Caucasus has been the base of all expeditions into Transcaspia, and that the latter province is garrisoned from the former, is in itself a proof that the Caucasus is the true base for a force advancing through Transcaspia on Afghanistan and India.

Neither am I childishly ill-informed as to the recent increase in the military strength of Russia, and if I laid no stress upon it, that was because it has no bearing on the invasion of India, since so long as it is impossible to move and feed more than 30,000 or 40,000 men in Transcaspia or Afghanistan, it can be of no consequence to India whether the whole Russian army numbers one million or two million men; and until the climate and general character of those countries are transformed, that limit will remain unchanged and unchangeable. Had you consulted any military man of experience, he would have told you that if the Indian army had been doubled in 1878-80, the Government could not have put a larger force into Afghanistan than the 60,000 men which, for a short time, it succeeded in maintaining in that country, where Russia's difficulties in the matter of transport and supply would far exceed ours.

Finally, I must dissent in the strongest manner from your contention that "if our command of the sea is complete, the whole of the regular troops of the country could probably be employed to greater advantage in India than elsewhere." Do you really believe that the superiority of the British fleet to that of all antagonists could ever be rendered so pronounced, so raised above the influence of chance and change, that a British Government would dare to propose to a British Commander-in-Chief to trust entirely to the navy and the reserve forces for the security of these islands? If this be so, then the last word of the forward policy has been spoken. I knew that there were men in India who contemplated locating the whole Indian army beyond the Indus, but I never dreamed that there were men at home who were anxious to transport the whole British army to India. The discovery, however, is not altogether unpleasant to me, since I cannot help hoping that this latest revelation of the lengths to which the supporters of the forward policy are prepared to carry it will help to open men's eyes to its inherent and dangerous folly.

H. B. Hanna, Colonel.

 We fear that Col. Hanna is even more prehistoric in his opinions than we supposed; but we should have to repeat our long review in order to prove our case point by point, and even then he would not be convinced.

THE BOOK SALES OF 1896.

I.

The usual method of ascertaining the presumed state of the book market at any period of time has, for some years past, been to compile statistics and strike a series of averages, and though this system is open to serious objection, it has, on the whole, a preponderance of convenience in its favour. That it is not wholly satisfactory becomes, however, clear enough when the principle is brought to its logical conclusion; for the real object in these cases should not be so much to ascertain the value in pounds, shillings, and pence of the books sold, as to estimate their intrinsic importance, and it unfortunately often happens that large and scholarly collections are sold for sums which tend to reduce the average rather than to increase it. For instance, let it be granted that the portion of the library of Mr. William Stuart dispersed on March 6th, 1895, shows the highest recorded average, which I believe to be the case; it must also be admitted that the 215 books, though they did sell for 4,297*l.*, or about 20*l.* per volume, were not as a whole of the same importance as, for example, those belonging to the Syston Park Library, where the average works out at about 14*l.*, or as those forming the Beckford Collection, where it reached less than 8*l.* The Stuart Sale was altogether exceptional in that four manuscripts realized 1,700*l.*, and six printed volumes more than 1,000*l.*, thus accounting for more than half the total sum obtained, and raising the average of the whole year to the extent of nearly two shillings. The result of the sales of 1896 also illustrates the unsoundness of the doctrine of averages in a remarkable manner. We find that during the year 47,268 lots of books yielded 80,111*l.* and some odd shillings, giving an altogether unusual average of 1*l.* 13*s.* 10*d.*, the figures for 1893 being 1*l.* 6*s.* 7*d.*, for 1894 1*l.* 8*s.* 5*d.*, and for 1895 1*l.* 11*s.* 4*d.* In 1895, as we have seen, a small sale increased the average on more than 47,000 lots by nearly two shillings, and in 1896 two volumes only raised it by as much as 1*s.* 2*d.* on about the same numerical basis. These volumes consisted of copies of the first edition of Chaucer's 'Canterbury Tales,' which, though more or less imperfect in each instance, produced 2,900*l.*, thus utterly upsetting any calculation that can be made from the reports of the year's sales. Perhaps if a series of fifty years were taken and calculations made from the results obtained during that period the outcome might be more satisfactory, though even this may well be doubted, for some books are worth more at one time than another, and half a century will make or mar the reputation of all authors save the very few. I still hold to the old-fashioned belief that the author makes the book, and that, irrespective altogether of the nature of the contents, he and it together will be tried not by contemporary critics, whose praise or blame is worthless except for the hour, but by time. For this reason alone (and there are others) a lengthy calculation is as unsatisfactory as a short one, and the only conclusion that can be arrived at is that it is just as possible to ascertain the present state of the book market by an appeal to past traditions as it is to prophesy what position it will hold in the future. Statistics are worth what any individual chooses or is able to make of them, and the tendency is to "argue round about," and to end in committing oneself to nothing except the approximate accuracy of the figures. These, as gathered from four years' records, are thus tabulated in the new volume of 'Book-Prices Current':—

The year 1896 was productive of sixty-one first-class sales. During the earlier months prices ruled low, and it was not until the opening of the season in October that they really recovered themselves, a circumstance very difficult to account for, since books seem to sell, as a rule, best in June and July. Another, and far more important fact, has reference to the marked change in fashion which many of these sales disclose. Some books are completely beyond the influence of this capricious mistress, but others are not, and it is melancholy to have to relate that early editions of the works of those comparatively modern authors who once appealed so successfully for popular favour are obviously in a decline. Dickens, Thackeray, Lever, Albert Smith, Jefferies, and the rest have ceased in a marked degree, not to interest, for they will always do that, but to excite competition. Should any work by one of these authors belong to the original or an early edition, and be in the finest possible state, then it will, as heretofore, command its full price; but the ordinary volume, good in its way, but not good enough to excite the interest of fastidious and rich collectors, has fallen on evil days. Now, perhaps, is the time to buy, for in any case books of this class must, from their very nature, eventually rise again. The "limited editions" of a number of contemporary poets and essayists, published to compete with those fashionable books which only a comparatively few collectors could afford to buy, are now ignored, and need not be considered. The favourite and ever-living books are still those time-tried classics of our own and other countries, past and present, which celebrated printers sent forth from presses that creak in their primitive way no more, yet did their work so well that comparison with some of our modern productions were odious in the extreme; literature, in all its branches, from the hands of masters living and dead; books of travel which opened up continents we have since inherited; books which describe the first gropings in the dark after great secrets, now as open as the day; works of artistic or antiquarian interest of acknowledged position; books of history compiled from documents and other sources of information, which are now either lost to us or could not be traced without extreme labour — all these classes of books and many others of the same high rank may certainly be thought even more of in the days to come than they are now, but can never be esteemed less.

The first sale of the year 1896 was held by Messrs. Puttick & Simpson on January 8th. It was not a particularly noticeable dispersion, and the prices realized were, on the whole, below the average. A complete set of Beavan's 'Reports of Cases in the Rolls Court,' 36 vols., 8vo., 1837–66, brought 20*l.* 10*s.*, and Dickens's 'Memoirs of Grimaldi,' first edition, 2 vols., 8vo., 1838, 3*l.* 4*s.* This is specially mentioned because it illustrates very fairly the fall that has taken place in the case of books of the kind. The copy was in the original cloth and clean, and the plate of 'The Last Song' had Crowquill's pantomimic border. A couple of years ago it would have produced about 5*l.* 5*s.*, and might have sold for more. This shows a loss of about two-fifths of the value, which on other and abundant evidence I take to be about the extent of the injury inflicted by the recent change in fashion with regard to all books of this kind which have not something highly exceptional about them. On January 14th Messrs. Sotheby sold a few books belonging to the late Rev. T. R. O'Flahertie, among them Dr. Donne's 'LXXX. Sermons,' 1640, folio, which once belonged to Isaac Walton, and had his donative incription on the title, "For my deserving and moste deare Ante Mrs. Susanna Cranmer from her dutifull and most affectionate nephew." This sold for 17*l.* On the same occasion Ben Jonson's 'The Masque of Queenes,' 1609, 4to., brought 20*l.*, and Morley's 'Plaine and Easie Introduction to Practical Musicke,' 1608, was sold with Douland's 'Andreas Ornithoparcus,' 1609, for 23*l.* 10*s.* Later in the same month 130 volumes of the Chetham Society's publications (first series complete, with index, 1844–86; new series, vols. i.–xv., 1883–88) brought 17*l.* 10*s.*; Dresser and Sharpe's 'Birds of Europe,' sixty parts (should be one hundred), 1871–77, 4to., 12*l.* 15*s.*; Dugdale's 'Warwickshire,' 2 vols., folio, 1730, 15*l.* 5*s.* (old calf); Milton's 'Paradise Lost,' 1667, 4to, first title-page, with the author's name in italic capitals, 90*l.*; Smith's 'Catalogue Raisonné,' 9 parts, 1829–42, 8vo., 20*l.* 15*s.*; and an imperfect copy of Eliot's Indian Bible, printed at Cambridge (Mass.) in 1685, 20*l.* Twenty copies of this work were published with a dedication to Charles II., and sent to England as presents. One of these, in its contemporary morocco binding with rough leaves, sold for 580*l.* on the dispersal of Lord Chancellor Hardwicke's library in June, 1888. The scarcity consists in the dedication, copies without it being comparatively common. One of these, in the original old calf binding, sold for 82*l.* on June 18th last, being the second and last that appeared in the sale-rooms during the year.

J. H. Slater.

PROF. MASPERO'S 'STRUGGLE OF THE NATIONS.'

My attention has just been drawn to the letter of Verax in your issue of the 2nd inst. As the translator, Mrs. McClure, is at present in the south of France, may I be allowed, in her absence, to make a few remarks in answer to the charges of Verax?

1. I must say at the outset that the Society for Promoting Christian Knowledge had nothing whatever to do with the modification of Prof. Maspero's diction in the cases cited by Verax.

2. Mrs. McClure, who is alone responsible for the modification of the few words in the original, was throughout in communication with Prof. Maspero, without whose consent she did not venture to qualify any expression in the text.

3. The passages cited by Verax show the nature of these qualified expressions. The chief charge of Verax is that in the English translation "the narrative says" is substituted for "tradition related" of the original, or that "sacred writings" (a term used by Prof. Maspero himself elsewhere in the volume) is used for "tradition" pure and simple. A further point is the cast of doubt thrown upon the views of the higher critics by such words as "some critics think" or "endeavour to show." Reuss, Wellhausen, Stade, and Budde are not yet, even in the eyes of their most ardent admirers, infallible, and the qualification of their absolute statements by such words as "think" or "endeavour to show" is neither treason to them nor to Prof. Maspero who quotes them. At any rate, the translator had Prof. Maspero's permission to make these qualifications, which were so few and trifling that the translator did not think it even necessary to mention them in the preface.

4. What then are we to think of Verax's rash assumption that Prof. Maspero's text has in certain passages been "surreptitiously tampered with" in the translation, or his charge of "literary bad faith" without knowing more about the circumstances? Is this assumption in keeping with an unprejudiced mind, and in harmony with the attitude of "the higher critic"?

EDMUND MCCLURE, Sec. S.P.C.K.

BYRON'S LETTERS.

Muswell Hill, Jan. 4, 1897.

PERMIT me to protest against some two or three inferences in your review of the first volume of that edition of Byron which I am preparing for Mr. Heinemann.

1. To begin with, there is "Mr. Henley's obvious hero-worship for Byron." But on what in this first volume does your reviewer ground his assumption that I "hero-worship" anybody? In Byron's case I have simply recalled and revived certain circumstances, forgotten or ignored, which tell in his favour. Your reviewer may call this "hero-worship." Would not it be better described as "common honesty"?

2. Again, my "Byron worship is somewhat of that curious strain which excludes not only Byron's enemies, but his opposites—as Shelley." How does your reviewer know? I have said no word in this first volume to show that my "Byron worship" (supposing it to exist) "excludes Shelley." When I come to deal with that master lyrist your reviewer may, or may not, have occasion to prefer his charge. Till then he is himself his sole authority; and his assurance, besides being distasteful to me, is calculated to mislead the public.

3. Lastly, my quotation of Moore's pasquil against 'The Living Dog' from a copy in the handwriting of Mrs. Leigh has "tempted Mr. Henley into the inaccurate subheading 'Thomas Moore to Leigh Hunt.'" It has done nothing of the kind. The "inaccurate subheading" is Mrs. Leigh's, not mine. It seemed to me significant that this gentle, kindly, charitable lady should be at the pains, not only of transcribing so savage a piece of satire as this of Moore's, but also of adding a kind of commentary. And I thought to interest readers by printing it as it left her hand. W. E. HENLEY.

 "Hero-worship" expresses our meaning more accurately than "common honesty" would have done; indeed, the latter term would not have been apposite; but we are sorry our choice of terms is distasteful to Mr. Henley. Shelley we shall be delighted to see dealt with in some future brilliant vignette. Of course the inaccurate subheading is Mrs. Leigh's, and we thought that its caustic quality tempted Mr. Henley to use it, inaccuracy and all. It seems that was the case; and we still think he was hardly well advised.

MR. ROBERT HARRISON.

WE regret to announce the death on Monday, the 4th inst., of Mr. Robert Harrison, late Secretary and Librarian of the London Library. Mr. Harrison was born in Liverpool, November 26th, 1820. His father, William Harrison, was a member of a good Lancashire family, and his mother a water-colour painter of repute. She was an original member of the New Water-Colour Society (now the Royal Institute of Painters in Water Colours), and two of his brothers were followers of the same art.

He began life as an assistant to the late Mr. Newman, the well-known parliamentary bookseller of High Holborn. He then settled for a time in Russia, where he acted as tutor in Prince Demidoff's family and as a lecturer in the St. Anne's School at St. Petersburg. There, in 1846, he married his wife, who survives him, and who went out from England to him. When the Crimean War broke out he returned to this country, and in 1855 he published 'Notes of a Nine Years' Residence in Russia, 1844 to 1853.' He was for a short time Librarian of the Leeds Library, and was appointed in 1857 Secretary and Librarian of the London Library, in succession to Mr. Bodham Donne, and here he remained until his resignation in 1893.

One of the effects of the Crimean War was to injure institutions subscription to which was considered as a luxury, and the London Library suffered among others. Mr. Harrison found it much crippled, but he left it prosperous. He had a liberal share of the many qualities that go to make a good librarian. He was always accessible, and, however busy, ready to attend to the inquiries of the members. To those who required it he showed pleasure in supplying help, which he was well able to do, as he possessed a wide knowledge of the contents of books, and an extensive acquaintance with several literatures. He was one of the founders of the Library Association, and its treasurer for ten years; he was a constant attendant at the meetings, which he helped to make a success by his genial temper and ready and agreeable speech. In 1891 he was elected President, and he presided at the Nottingham meeting.

He was a fairly strong man, but he suffered from gout, and his health was much broken when he retired from the office he had filled so long with honour to himself and advantage to the institution he served. Besides the work already noted he wrote with Mr. Joseph Gostwick 'Outlines of German Literature,' first published in 1873 (second edition, 1883). He edited Mackenzie's 'Dictionary of Universal Biography,' and assisted Capt. Hozier in his account of the Franco-Prussian War. Among much other literary work may be mentioned his contributions to the 'Dictionary of National Biography.'

His long service at the London Library brought him into constant association with most of the leading literary men of the last forty years, and his experiences would have furnished material for an interesting volume of reminiscences, which he always had in his mind to compile. When, however, the leisure came to him his strength was no longer equal to the task. His work was completed before he passed peaceably away, but his loss will long be felt by numerous friends, who will cherish his memory with feelings of affection and esteem.

THE BIBLIOGRAPHICAL SOCIETY.

13, Cheniston Gardens.

YOUR last week's issue, which contained a very kindly notice of the Transactions of the Bibliographical Society, contained also, in another review, an allusion to the "absurdity" committed by the Society in limiting the number of its members. As I was mainly responsible for the resolution by which this step was taken, may I say two words in its defence? Every one familiar with the history of societies knows how greatly they suffer from the person of transient enthusiasm, who becomes a member only to retire at the end of a twelvemonth, thereby breaking into a set of publications, his odd volumes of which promptly figure in a dealer's catalogue at a price which does not enhance the Society's credit. The only safeguards against this nuisance are the imposition of a heavy entrance fee, which would exclude many highly desirable members along with the undesirable ones, or else the adoption of some such rule as our own, which makes readmission sufficiently difficult to cause members to hesitate before lightly resigning their privileges. The first effect of our notice, that bookmen must make up their minds whether they wished to join us or not, was nearly to double our numbers, and now that the roll of the Society is permanently fixed at 300, we have far fewer vacancies to fill at the end of each year than when we had only 160 members. We have the further advantage of a fixed income, to which we can adjust the expenses of our publications, and our balance sheet, in consequence, is always satisfactory. To meet the case of any especially desirable candidate presenting himself when there is no vacancy, the Council is empowered to elect not more than 15 candidate-members, who have all the rights of membership except that of holding office. No effort is made to fill these vacancies, and one of them is therefore always available when needed. I think that a system which secures these results cannot reasonably be charged with "absurdity," but that, on the contrary, it is one which other societies might perhaps do well to consider.

ALFRED W. POLLARD, Hon. Sec.

Literary Gossip.

THE second volume of Mr. S. R. Gardiner's history of the Commonwealth and Protectorate is now in the press; it will bring the story down to the summer of 1654. Mr. Gardiner is also preparing for publication a monograph on 'Cromwell's Place in History,' giving the substance of six lectures delivered at Oxford as Ford's Lecturer, 1896.

THE Committee of the London Library propose to pay off the debentures of 12,500*l.* now due, and to carry into effect the scheme of reconstruction of the society's premises authorized by the general meetings held in 1895 and 1896. For this purpose they intend to issue debenture stock, bearing interest at the rate of 3½ per cent. per annum, and redeemable by annual drawings, commencing in the year 1899. Proposals to this effect will be submitted to the general meeting to be held on the afternoon of Thursday next.

MR. COVENTRY PATMORE died just six weeks ago—namely, on Thursday, the 26th of November. In illustration of the small interest which colonial society takes in contemporary literary annals, a correspondent sends us an extract from a private letter received last Monday from Cape Town:—

"I am very sorry to hear of Mr. Patmore's death. Your letter was the first intimation we received out here. The Agencies will cable if some moneyed Jew buys a house in Park Lane—but—phew!"

Yet one would have thought the death of him who wrote 'The Angel in the House' would have been telegraphed to the colonial capitals of the Empire.

MESSRS. SMITH, ELDER & Co. will publish immediately in this country a collection of the outdoor papers of Mr. John Burroughs, a writer who has a high reputation in the United States, entitled 'A Year in the Fields.' The essays are illustrated by twenty half-tone pictures by Mr. Clifton Johnson, who made several visits to Mr. Burroughs's home on the Hudson and to the home of his boyhood in the Catskills to obtain them.

THE Lord Mayor has consented to preside at the next anniversary dinner of the Printers' Pension, Almshouse, and Orphan Asylum Corporation, which has been fixed to take place on Tuesday, April 6th, at the Hôtel Métropole.

MR. GEORGE GISSING'S new novel 'The Whirlpool' will be published in the spring by Messrs. Lawrence & Bullen.

The Duke of Norfolk has given the wags a chance to bring out once more the well-worn joke about "men of letters" in the Post Office. In choosing from his staff the members of the British delegation to attend the Congress of the Universal Postal Union to be held next May at Washington, he has fixed upon three Post Office men who are in both senses "men of letters." These are Mr. Spencer Walpole, who, besides being Secretary of the Post Office, has a well-recognized place as an historian, biographer, and critic; Mr. Buxton Forman, Assistant Secretary and Controller of Packet Services, who has edited the works of Shelley and Keats in season and out of season; and Mr. A. B. Walkley, whose contributions to dramatic criticism are well known. It is no secret that there are many voluminous files of papers in the archives of the Post Office in which the student of the future may find his dry-as-dust task considerably lightened by the results of Mr. Walkley's application of his talents to some of the higher work connected with postal administration.

With reference to the statement recently made in a daily paper, that the offer of the Committee of the Gibbon Commemoration (1894) to defray the cost of a memorial tablet to the historian in the chapel of Magdalen College had been finally declined by the President and Fellows, we are authorized to state that the Committee have resolved to expend the subscriptions remaining in their hands by presenting to each of the subscribers a copy of the historian's 'Autobiography' (which will shortly be edited and published by Mr. John Murray) as a memento of the commemoration.

Mr. A. H. Keane writes:—

"In your notice of Mr. Theal's book on 'The Portuguese in South Africa' (Athenæum, December 26th, 1896) reference is made to the author's statement that Monomotapa is the name, not of a country, but of a paramount chief. Would you kindly allow me to point out that five years before the appearance of this work I was able to show, on documentary evidence, that 'Monomotapa was not a principality, but a prince—not an empire, but an emperor,' &c.? (Monograph on 'The Portuguese in South Africa' in Mr. R. W. Murray's 'South Africa,' Stanford, 1891.)"

The knighthood conferred on Dr. J. T. Gilbert has been well bestowed, as no one else among living antiquaries has done so much to elucidate the annals of Ireland from the Norman Conquest down to the Restoration. Among his contributions to historical research are his 'History of the City of Dublin,' in three volumes; his 'History of the Viceroys of Ireland, 1172–1509'; the 'Historical and Municipal Documents of Ireland, 1172–1320,' and 'National Manuscripts of Ireland,' 5 vols., large folio (coloured plates); his 'History of Affairs in Ireland, 1641–52,' six parts, 1879–81; and his 'History of the Irish Confederation and the War in Ireland, 1641–49.' Besides he has edited the chartularies of St. Mary's Abbey at Dublin and Dunbrody; the register of the Abbey of St. Thomas, Dublin; and the Calendar of Ancient Records of Dublin.

A declaration identical in most or all respects with that which was signed by the Irish Roman Catholic laity, demanding the establishment by the State of a new university on denominational lines, has been prepared for presentation to the Government. It is signed by about twelve peers, three judges of the High Court, seventy-two members of Parliament, and considerably more than a thousand others. We have already placed on record the signing of a similar memorial by the Roman Catholic bishops.

We mentioned some time ago the notable increase of endowments at Cambridge during the previous twelve months. It seems that the University of Edinburgh was enriched in 1896 by gifts amounting to close upon 25,000*l*. The annual value of university scholarships, bursaries, and prizes is 15,630*l*.

An appeal is made for a small fund in order to add to the buildings of the Walthamstow Grammar School, founded by Sir George Monoux.

Mr. Jackson, of Leeds, is preparing a volume of Sedbergh School songs collected by Mr. R. Ainslie, one of the masters of the school. The author illustrates it with sketches of the scenery of the district.

We regret to hear of the death of Miss Blackwood, the clever daughter of "Old Ebony," who preserved for later generations the traditions of the days when Wilson and Lockhart were warring against the world in general, and the Edinburgh Whigs in particular.

The decease is announced of Mr. Thomas Guille, the founder of the Guille Library at Guernsey.

We have also to record the decease of the learned Count Mas-Latrie at an advanced age. He published his 'Chronique des Papes, des Conciles Généraux, et des Conciles de France' as long ago as 1837, and he brought out his valuable 'Trésor de Chronologie, d'Histoire, et de Géographie du Moyen-âge' as late as 1889. He wrote a history of Cyprus under the house of Lusignan; he published a continuation down to 1837 of Anquetil's history of France, a work on the treaties of peace between the Mohammedans of Northern Africa and Christian powers, &c.

SCIENCE

Charles Pritchard, D.D., F.R.S., late Savilian Professor of Astronomy in the University of Oxford. Memoirs of his Life compiled by his Daughter. (Seeley & Co.)

Prof. Pritchard was a unique and many-sided man, and it is not remarkable that several pens have shared in the production of this memorial of his life and work. Only the last chapter of this memoir was written by Miss Ada Pritchard, though she is responsible for the arrangement of the rest, and the preface is from her own pen. In it she remarks that whilst the method adopted in the joint work has of necessity interfered somewhat with the chronological sequence of the chapters, it has this advantage, that each part of the life "has been dealt with by the writer best qualified to form a just estimate of it."

Into the details of the biography we do not propose to enter. The first chapter, containing reminiscences of Prof. Pritchard's early life, was contributed by his niece, Mrs. Ward. The family, she tells us, had been settled for three generations in Shropshire; but the father of the late Professor removed to Brixton, where Charles (the subject of this notice, who was his youngest child) was born on February 28th, 1808. He lost his mother when only twelve years old, and after his eldest sister's marriage in 1822 his father returned to Shrewsbury and married a second time, surviving till 1859. Charles was left to the care of other relatives, and it was chiefly at the instance of his brother-in-law, Mr. Allan (Mrs. Ward's father), that means were found for sending him as a sizar to St. John's College, Cambridge, where he graduated in 1830 as Fourth Wrangler, and became Fellow of his College two years afterwards, having already been the author of a treatise on the theory of statical couples and of papers communicated to the Cambridge Philosophical Society. For a short time he was head master of a school at Stockwell, and for twenty-eight years of a newly founded grammar school at Clapham. Here he pursued astronomy as a parergon (to use his own favourite phrase), being elected a Fellow of the Royal Astronomical Society in 1849; and after making various contributions to its Proceedings, and taking part in the Himalaya expedition sent to Spain for the purpose of observing there the total eclipse of July 18th, 1860, he was elected President of the Society in 1866, holding that office for the usual term of two years, and delivering very able addresses in presenting the Gold Medal to Dr. Huggins and to the late M. Le Verrier respectively. He was ordained when he first went to Clapham, and resigned his mastership there in 1862, for reasons not necessary to mention.

From that time he resided during eight years in retirement at Freshwater, in the Isle of Wight (where the present writer found him one summer's afternoon diligently assisting in harvesting a hay crop in his own field), from time to time taking part in Church Congresses and in meetings of the British Association (before which he repeatedly preached), being also appointed Hulsean Lecturer at Cambridge in 1867. But in 1870 he was elected to succeed Donkin as Savilian Professor of Astronomy at Oxford. The energy with which, at the age of sixty-two, he threw himself into the work was admirable; the new observatory for the special cultivation of astronomical physics was founded under his eye, being greatly helped by the late Dr. De La Rue's presentation of instruments, and it was completed in 1875. His successor, Prof. Turner, gives in the work before us a most interesting and discriminating account of his labours there, which were chiefly in the departments of photometry and the application of photography to the determination of stellar parallax. In the former he invented a new instrument, called the wedge-photometer, with which he superintended the measurement of the relative brightnesses of 2,784 stars; and in order to determine as nearly as possible the true value of atmospheric absorption for formation of his scale, he undertook a journey to Egypt in 1883. For his photometric work and the catalogue formed from it (called 'Uranometria Nova Oxoniensis') the Royal Astronomical Society awarded him in 1885 their Gold Medal, uniting with it one to Prof. E. Pickering, of Harvard College, Mass., for similar researches conducted by a different method.

We have left little space to speak of Prof. Pritchard's theological work, which chiefly bore on the relations between science and Scripture. The portion of the present volume which relates to this subject is from the pen of the Bishop of Worcester (Dr. Perowne). Prof. Pritchard died on May 28th, 1893, and the composite memoir before us will be appreciated by many readers as giving an interesting account of a very remarkable personality.

SIR JOSEPH BANKS'S JOURNAL.

21, Cautley Avenue, Clapham Common, Dec. 26, 1896.

REFERRING to the review of Sir Joseph Banks's 'Journal' which appears in your issue of to-day's date (pp. 908–909), there are one or two points touched upon which may be deemed worthy of further elucidation. A comparison of the translation by M. de Fréville with the anonymous publication of Becket & De Hondt shows that the French book was translated directly from that work, with a very few additional amplifications by the translator. The suggestion that it was the work of the clerk Richard Orton is probable; we find such errors as "Captain Cooke" for Lieut. Cook, Fuego is always misspelled "Feugo," details of the character of each anchorage are given, and the bearings also; but it is silent as to the death of the two negroes, Banks's servants, when absent from the vessel in Patagonia. The first person is used in describing the visits paid to the convent in Madeira, as though Cook were the narrator, when not even his name is correctly cited. Possibly some of these slips are due to the haste in issuing the work, of which the introduction is dated September 28th, 1771.

Poor as it was, Banks seems to have sent a copy to the Académie des Sciences, for in the Journal des Sçavans, Juin, 1772, pp. 344–351, we find an abstract of it, with a quotation from his accompanying letter: "C'est ainsi que M. Banks nous a donné un extrait sommaire de son dernier voyage, dont il espère que la relation paroîtra en 1773" (l. c., p. 350). Sir Joseph Banks was ready enough to spend money lavishly in acquiring material in any shape of natural history, but shrank from the drudgery of working out his results. He was content to amass stores for others to elaborate, but could not in his own person undertake the labour of reducing his observations to scientific order. In some departments he was admirably served. Solander, apart from his constitutional indolence and love for society, was an ideal naturalist, and his successor Dryander was even more remarkable for his concentration on matters connected with the vast and rich collections which it was the delight of his employer to bring together. B. DAYDON JACKSON.

Blackheath, Dec. 30, 1896.

IN a notice of the 'Journal of Sir Joseph Banks' which is given in the Athenæum of the 26th inst., the writer says that he does not remember to have seen, in the many accounts of Cook's voyages, reference to the true origin of his first visit to the Society Islands, which he takes to be the publication of a 'Mémoire' by Lalande in 1764 on the forthcoming transit of Venus in 1769, pointing out the desirability of having it observed in the South Pacific Ocean. Now Prof. Hornsby contributed a much more elaborate paper to the Philosophical Transactions for 1765, which, according to Thomson in his 'History of the Royal Society,' was what led to the Society's application to the king to send out an expedition to the Pacific for observation of the transit. Hornsby does not refer to Lalande's 'Mémoire,' and it seems unlikely that he had seen it; but at any rate his own paper, calculating the circumstances of the transit of 1769, is evidently quite original, and suggests various islands from which he thinks it might be observed. Of course this was before the voyage of Wallis in which he visited Tahiti and called it King George's Island; whether it was the same which had been discovered many years before by the Spanish navigator De Quiros must always remain uncertain. It seems to me then that Hornsby's paper, not Lalande's, was what first gave occasion to the discussion which led to the application resulting in Cook's voyage.

W. T. LYNN.

 We are pleased to find Mr. Daydon Jackson in agreement with our suggestion as to the origin of the first anonymous journal of the Endeavour's voyage. This publication, it may be remarked, is dedicated to the Lords of the Admiralty, to Mr. Banks and Dr. Solander; whilst on p. 2 one of the publishers, Mr. Becket, states that he is convinced "it is the production of a gentleman and a scholar who made the voyage." Now Richard Orton was neither a gentleman nor a scholar, but we venture to adhere to our opinion that it was he who supplied the material—indeed, the use of the first person in certain portions of the narrative indicates direct appropriation of parts of Cook's official journal, which was actually transcribed by Orton as amanuensis of that commander. Whoever it was, it must have been some one who remained on board the Endeavour after Cook and Banks had landed at Deal on the 12th–13th July; for the anonymous writer states he landed on the 15th. Now there was one individual who must have been particularly interested, beyond all others, in obtaining the earliest possible information regarding Cook's expedition. This was Alexander Dalrymple. It is not impossible that this eminent geographer—who had so earnestly desired to command the expedition to discover a great southern continent—might have preconcerted an arrangement with some person on board the Endeavour to supply him with news of the discoveries accomplished by Cook in advance of the official publication. Dalrymple's jealousy of Cook and his animosity towards Dr. Hawkesworth are exemplified in his later publications. Mr. Jackson rightly conjectures that Banks sent a copy of this journal, when published, to the French Academy; and as M. de Fréville describes it, in his translation, as the journal of a "Voyage autour du monde, fait par MM. Banks et Solander," it may well be supposed that Dr. Solander prepared the abstract, notes, and emendations which subsequently appeared in the Journal des Sçavans. Altogether, it is a curious complication, which perhaps may be unravelled by further research.

Mr. Lynn's proposition can hardly be sustained by his arguments. For, indeed, it was even before the previous transit of 1761 that Lalande had prepared a geographical chart, on which he laid down the times of ingress and egress of the planet on the sun's disc, calculated for the most favourable places on the globe for observations to be made by Delisle's method. And, as Mr. Lynn rightly observes, although Tahiti had not been discovered, there was good reason for supposing there were lands—islands, if not a continent—in the South Pacific suitable for the purpose. A 'Mémoire' containing this chart was published in 1764, by which time, however, the French astronomer had already put himself in communication with sovereigns, ministers, and learned societies all over Europe, urging expeditions for carrying out these important observations for ascertaining the sun's parallax. In this same year Lalande came over to London to confer with Maskelyne—who, it will be remembered, was to succeed Bliss as Astronomer Royal the following year. Moreover, Lalande's intimate friend, Bougainville, had ten years previously been elected a Fellow of the Royal Society, so that we cannot doubt that when this society memorialized the British Government in 1768 Lalande's 'Mémoire' must have produced as great an effect and had as much weight with the authorities at the Admiralty as the paper of the Savilian Professor. However original Hornsby's elaborate memoir may have been, it seems incredible that the author can have been unaware of Lalande's publications, which had been circulated throughout Europe. However, apart from the above considerations, in our notice of Banks's 'Journal' we were actually led to trace the origin of the Endeavour's voyage by consulting M. de Fréville's introduction to his translation of the anonymous pamphlet purporting to be Dr. Solander's journal. We hope Mr. Lynn may be induced to unearth from the archives at Greenwich Observatory some records of Lalande's conferences with Maskelyne which may elucidate this interesting subject.

Science Gossip.

IT is understood that Mr. H. Goss and Canon Fowler, who for the last eleven years have been joint secretaries of the Entomological Society, do not propose to seek re-election at the annual meeting of the Society on the 20th inst.

THE Institution of Civil Engineers, which attained its seventy-ninth anniversary on the 2nd inst., consists, according to a list corrected to date, of 1,903 members, 3,833 associate members, 331 associates, 21 honorary members, and 884 students—together 6,972 of all classes, and representing an increase during the past year of nearly 3 per cent.

THE French papers say that the widow of Baron Hirsch is going to present two millions of francs to the Pasteur Institute, and is consulting the managers as to the allotment of the funds.

THE death is announced of General Walker, the American statistician and writer on finance.

M. NOBEL'S bequest of his whole property for the promotion of science is magnificent, but it may be doubted whether there are not already enough prizes in the scientific world, and whether research would not have been more effectually aided by a different application of the money.

BY the death of Louis Vivien de Saint-Martin, France has lost the oldest and in some respects the most distinguished of her geographers. Born at St. Martin-de-Fontenoy, Calvados, on May 22nd, 1802, young Vivien first went to Paris in 1814, and lived there or at Versailles up to the time of his death. He was not a great traveller like Ritter, still less an explorer, and won distinction solely as a savant and student. His first works were an elementary atlas and a georama (1826), the first globe of the kind seen in Paris. Since 1840 he had devoted his attention solely to geographical subjects. For a period of fourteen years (1842–56) he edited the Annales des Voyages. In 1845 he commenced the publication of a 'Histoire Universelle des Découvertes Géographiques,' planned on a gigantic scale, of which only three volumes, dealing with Asia Minor, have ever seen the light. Many years of his life were devoted to the study of the ancient geography of Asia and Northern Africa, his principal works dealing with this vast subject being 'Études sur la Géographie et les Populations Primitives du Nord-ouest de l'Inde d'après les Hymnes Védiques' (1860), 'Étude sur la Géographie Grecque et Latine de l'Inde' (1858-60), and 'Le Nord de l'Afrique dans l'Antiquité Grecque et Romaine' (1863). Between 1863 and 1875 he published 'L'Année Géographique,' a masterly survey of geographical progress. This useful work was carried on for a few years longer by M. Maunoir and M. Duveyrier, but has since been discontinued. His 'Histoire de Géographie' (1873) is a work of authority. In 1874 he planned a 'Nouveau Dictionnaire de Géographie Universelle,' and brought out the first volume, but allowed this monumental work to be completed by his friend Rousselet. His 'Atlas Universel de Géographie' in eighty-four maps, the first of which appeared in 1877, is being slowly completed by M. F. Schrader. At the time of his death he was engaged upon a 'Dictionnaire de Géographie Historique,' the MS. of which has been bequeathed by him to the Académie des Inscriptions. Vivien was one of the founders of the Paris Geographical Society (1822), and at the time of his death was one of its honorary presidents. He was a member of the Berlin Academy, an honorary fellow of numerous learned societies, and a Chevalier of the Legion of Honour.

A small planet, probably to be reckoned as No. 426, was discovered by M. Charlois at Nice on the 28th ult.

The editorship of the Astronomical Journal (which is henceforth to have the words "Founded by B. A. Gould" under the title on each number) has devolved upon Dr. S. C. Chandler, who has made many valuable contributions to its columns; at his own request Profs. Asaph Hall and Lewis Boss are to collaborate with him in it.

M. Poincaré has been appointed Professor of Mathematical Astronomy and Celestial Mechanics at Paris, in the room of the late M. Tisserand.

TWO PAMPHLETS.

Notes on the Cross of Cong. By M. Stokes. (Privately printed.)—The elaborate and delicate relic to which Miss Stokes has devoted this monograph is one of the finest works of its kind. It is the more interesting because it is dated 1123, that is, three years after the wreck of the Blanche Nef, and bears the sole record of the maker in his name, which, in full, was Maelísu (Maeljesu) MacBratdair O'Echan, together with the names of Therdelbuch U Chonchobair (Turlough O'Conor), King of Erin, who employed that goldsmith, and Domnall Mac Flannacan U Dubthaig (O'Duffy), Bishop of Connaught, who "superintended its execution." Whatever the last phrase may mean, it is an awkward one for those who persist in thinking that to the mediæval workman, and to the workman alone, i. e., in this case O'Echan, is the credit due for what is nowadays so very oddly called "applied art." The cross itself is a singularly fine specimen of that late offshoot of the Romano-Byzantine school of decorative design which under various, but not very different forms, flourished in Ireland, England, and Scandinavia, and used to be called Hibernian. It is of the same epoch as the noble chalice of St. Remi and the analogous shrine of St. Patrick's Bell (which dates from 1100), and, though resembling them in style, it is more refined and elaborate. Like other similar works, it was made to contain a fragment of the True Cross, which, in the Chronicle of Inisfallen, is said to have been sent to Ireland in 1123, but more probably at a later date. It is of the Latin form. The shaft is 2 ft. 6 in. high; the arms extend 1 ft. 6¾ in.; the material of the body is oak. Encrusted with plates of gilt copper and brass, at the intersection is a circular crystal, like a lens, covering an orifice intended to contain the relic. Prof. MacCullagh observing that the fragment now under the lens is of oak, which the True Cross was not, doubted the genuineness of the existing fragment. Miss Stokes, as in duty bound, sees no reason for hesitation on this account, other fragments alleged to be genuine being of the same sort of wood. Besides the metal plates and crystal, the Cross of Cong is enriched with red and green stones cut en cabochon, and, in the Romano-Byzantine manner, set as studs, so as to protect the fine interlaced filigree gold work, which is fastened by rivets to the copper plates beneath. The studs were originally eighteen in number, arranged at regular intervals along the edges, and on the face of the shaft and arms of the cross spaces remain for nine others, which were placed at intervals down the centre. The filigree work is so exceptionally well designed and choicely executed as to excite the wonder of all who have studied it. On this point we should like to call attention to a circumstance which has never, so far as we know, been mentioned in connexion with Irish, Anglo-Saxon, or Scandinavian filigree work, and which may serve to mitigate the wonder of amateurs. We refer to the manifest fact that in countries where cloisonnés enamels were designed and made, the elaboration of filigree work would of necessity come naturally to those who were accustomed to design and execute cloisonnés enamels, as many were in Western Europe. What is filigree work but extremely intricate cloisonné work without its enamels? Miss Stokes rightly says that the reliquary which may with most profit be compared with the Cross of Cong is the Anglo-Saxon cross in the treasury of the church of SS. Gudule et Michel at Brussels, which is also believed to have been made to contain a fragment of the True Cross. The custom of shaping reliquaries in accordance with the relics they were to contain is observable in innumerable cases before monstrances came into use. Several instances of alleged fragments of the True Cross being enshrined in cruciform cases are mentioned by Miss Stokes; but all shrines of this sort were not cruciform. Zoomorphic types occur in the interlacements of the filigree in the Cross of Cong; these and the other details of Maelísu O'Echan's masterpiece are well shown in the plates before us.

We are indebted to Mr. R. Inwards for a copy of his contribution to the Quarterly Journal of the Meteorological Society, No. 98, April, 1896, which, with two diagrams, deals with Turner's Representations of Lightning. To explain them we cannot do better than quote the opening passages, which the diagrams (1) of 'Turner's Lightning,' as represented in his picture of the 'Bass Rock,' and (2) of a 'Photograph of Lightning,' as taken instantaneously from nature, distinctly affirm. Mr. Inwards writes:—

"The truth to nature of Turner's representations of lightning has been several times mentioned before the Society, but I thought it would be interesting to bring before the Fellows an actual example of Turner's work, placed side by side with a photograph of a real flash of lightning, presenting the same general character, and perhaps coming under the head of meandering lightning; at all events, it is a flash of that kind which seems to attempt to double back upon itself, and which makes many sudden turns before getting finally on its earthward course. Collated with this view is a photograph from the Society's collection, and which, of course, was taken direct from nature. It will be seen that Turner has caught the general form and character of the rapid contortions and abrupt curves of the lightning with a most amazing fidelity, and he has even drawn the flash in several places by a doubled line, just as we often see in photographs from nature. In fact, there is a doubled part in the photograph. If the picture had been by any one but Turner I should have put this down to a mere careless stroke of the brush, but being from the hand of so consummate a master, I can have no doubt that his keen eye saw the effect, which his swift hand almost as quickly committed to paper."

And Mr. Inwards concludes his observations on additional instances, all equally interesting and conclusive, as follows: "One is inclined to take literally the eulogium passed by John Ruskin on this great master: 'Unfathomable in knowledge, solitary in power.....sent as a prophet to reveal to men the mysteries of the universe.'"

THE ROYAL ACADEMY.—WINTER EXHIBITION. LORD LEIGHTON'S PICTURES.

From this collection of more than two hundred works in oil none of the most important of the late President's pictures that are removable from the walls they decorate is absent, with the exception of the beautiful 'Wedded,' the gaily coloured 'Odalisque,' 'Jezebel and Ahab,' 'Clytemnestra watching for the Return of Agamemnon,' 'Phryne at Eleusis,' and 'Antigone.' A large number, too, of his drawings and designs made to illustrate 'Romola' and other books, very many exercises in pencil and silver-point—some of them most exquisite—and a few models in the round and relief are included in a comprehensive gathering which more than adequately represents the astonishing industry and skill of one of the most distinguished artists England has produced in this century. In presence of such an exhibition the student will be more than ever impressed by Leighton's ample endowment of the indomitable "power of taking pains" which is said to characterize the great masters of every art and science. The collection is more truly representative of the rise and progress of the painter than any that has been seen before, inasmuch as it includes works not till now seen in London, the most interesting being Cimabue finding Giotto in the Fields of Florence (No. 177), which was the first work he finished, and which was shown at Brussels in 1850. It is an astonishing fact that the works Leighton exhibited in London amounted to 255. Nevertheless, his total output, studies of importance included, far exceeds this number, while some of the most ambitious, such as the lunettes at South Kensington and the fresco at Lyndhurst, are not reckoned in the total we have named.

All the world knows that Leighton's reputation was established by Cimabue's 'Madonna' carried through Florence, which, as No. 65, occupies a leading position in Gallery III., and is a loan from the Queen. This work is the only purchase, we believe, Her Majesty ever made of the first contribution sent by a young and, until then, unknown artist to a public exhibition. It took the art world by storm in 1855, and has since then more than maintained its reputation, and more than justified the Queen's judgment. It clearly indicated that, given health and years enough, its author would achieve a conspicuous position among the painters of the century. Great as was the distinction won by him at the Academy he was afterwards to head, there came a cold shadow over his fortunes when 'The Triumph of Music' (not 'Orpheus and Eurydice,' which, as No. 61, illustrates Browning in Gallery III.) followed 'Cimabue' in 1856, and, greatly to the chagrin of the artist, was condemned by some of the critics of the day. Much nonsense was written about that unlucky work, which we remember quite well, and which deserved respectful treatment, even if it did not merit the admiration awarded to its forerunner. 'The Triumph of Music' is not here.

It is a noteworthy fact in Leighton's history that, while most men of his calibre and energy secure no small part of their reputation by the time they are of age, he was more than twenty-five years old when 'Cimabue' proved beyond mistake that he had attained a very high degree of technical skill before the general public knew anything about him. It is owing to this unusual circumstance that we have no experimental paintings here to comment upon, nor, for that matter, any considerable development, nor any distinctly important change in his methods and style to record. And when once what may be called the tentative, but not immature group of Leighton's works is disposed of, the rest of his paintings stand nearly on the same level. They differ, of course, in the happiness of their inspiration, in physical and technical beauty, in the splendour of their lighting, and the charm of coloration, which none strove more ardently than he to secure; but, except in degree, the characteristic qualities of Michael Angelo nursing his Dying Servant (2) and The Star of Bethlehem (28), both of which belong to 1862, are much the same as those of Flaming June (75) of 1895 and Clytie (60), which, left hardly finished in 1896, is practically the last work Leighton touched.

Accordingly we intend to begin by calling attention to the tentative works, and afterwards proceed to say something about the best of the other pictures in the order they occupy on the walls of the Academy. Cimabue finding Giotto (177) needs no further comment than that it bears testimony to the industry and success of the studies of the youthful Leighton in Rome, Berlin, Frankfort, and Paris. The names of the schools he frequented are enough to convince us that nothing but eclecticism could result from training so multifarious and models so dissimilar. In fact, the wonder is that anything like original genius survived so much teaching, and splendid as the results of his schooling were, there cannot be a doubt that it would have been much better for him if he had had a good deal less education. No. 177 exhibits his inborn sense of colour. His training had given him a profound knowledge of form, and that strong scientific feeling of which he had so much ensured a logical attention to the veracities of light and shade; while his liking for an artistic anecdote made the designing of such a theme as that he selected for No. 177 very easy to him. A Persian Pedlar (182) shows the colourist at work, and the man of taste diligently studying those harmonies of line which the draperies and posture of the figure and the masses of its accessories permit. Its date is 1852.

Cimabue's 'Madonna' carried through Florence (65) was finished in 1855 (it was the outcome of long previous labour), and sent to the Academy, with results of which we have already spoken. It at present faces Daphnephoria (81), finished just twenty-one years later, which marked the culminating point of his art. These works show plainly how Leighton delighted in painting processions. The continuity of flowing lines, the repetitions of similar elements, and the abundant opportunities for introducing graceful attitudes among figures actuated by a common motive, to say nothing of the stateliness appertaining to such subjects, had a singular fascination for him. As a designer of compositions of this nature, not even Sir John Gilbert—who loves a procession, especially when it involves rapid movements and furious gestures—has excelled Leighton when he had to deal with regular and gradual movements, more particularly if they were accompanied and directed by music. Owing to this, 'Cimabue' and 'Daphnephoria' were subjects after his own heart, and he threw himself into the painting of them without the least regard to the rewards of the future, for he knew that few could buy or house the latter, and it is understood he got much less that 500*l.* for the former picture. No doubt, too, the enthusiasm of Leighton, always a genuine lover of his art, was fed and heightened by the idea that in some such picture as this he might worthily illustrate an event so momentous in the history of painting as the carrying of the great 'Madonna' from the bottega of Cimabue to the church which it was destined to adorn. He was perfectly aware that since the fall of Rome no such honour had been vouchsafed to art or an artist

There is a certain local disconnexion, not to say harshness, in the coloration, lights, and shadows of this noble work, and even the figures or parts of the groups to which they belong, and the groups themselves are to some extent isolated (a defect Leighton avoided in later works), but they are on the other hand remarkable for the softness, breadth, and fusion of their detail. This softening was carried so far that many who objected to the artist's methods founded their complaints upon it, and compared the carnations of his figures to the paintings on plum-boxes. The carnations of nearly all the figures in 'Cimabue' are, besides, rather opaque, the roses in their cheeks are reddish and spotty, while in the flesh generally there is an excess of yellow and a lack of greyness. The local colours, too, are "cut up" to some extent, even more, perhaps, than the artist's desire to represent the brightness of Florentine daylight warranted. The chiaroscuro not less than the coloration and general treatment of this picture go far to prove that Leighton, before he painted it, had saturated his mind with the study of the frescoes which were daily before him in Tuscany and Rome. If we want to be sure of this we need only observe how brilliant is the tonality of the picture, how light is its background of architecture and draperies, and how distinctly all the figures stand upon that background. It is a striking merit in his picture that the figures really seem to move rhythmically to the music, and this is one of many proofs of his profound sympathy with his subject, and with the manner in which one of the quattrocentisti would have attempted this momentous theme if he had enjoyed those technical facilities later centuries gave to Leighton. Besides, the air of constraint which characterizes all the figures in 'Cimabue' is yet another symptom of the influence of early Florentine design upon its artist in 1854–5. The composition, like the composition of the early fifteenth century, resembles that of a bas-relief, and is without the vigour Signorelli introduced, while it is quite in harmony with this sculpture-like effect that the draperies, ornaments, and even some of the attitudes of their wearers remind us of the style of Ghiberti, as developed in the later gates of the Baptistery, not the earlier ones which recall the stiffness of Masolino. Indeed, if Leighton had had constantly before him a picture by Peselino, he could not have approached more closely the middle Florentine manner of designing and painting draperies. Finally, let us say of 'Cimabue' that its draughtsmanship evinces the painter's close study of form, and the mastery he had already attained in the use of the brush. That he was an eclectic by nature not less than by what were really cosmopolitan studies is obvious to those who carefully examine this masterpiece of his youth, and, as at present, have before them the outcome of his life's work.

Salome, the Daughter of Herodias (12), which in chronological order is the next picture here, clearly shows that while working upon it Leighton had to a large extent freed his style from the trammels that timidity rather than lack of skill imposed upon him in 'Cimabue.' In 'Salome' and in The Mermaid (26), which followed it, the movements, expressions, and draperies, not less than the painting of the carnations, are more lifelike than before, the tonality is at once richer and more massive. In these respects the influence of Venice as well as the technical development of the artist himself are plainly perceptible. There is a good deal of Titianesque handling in the flesh of the mermaid, and her exuberant forms would have been distasteful to Leighton when he was at work on 'Cimabue.' Similar qualities, but a very distinctly inferior coloration, were to be found in 'The Triumph of Music' and the 'Paolo and Francesca' which Leighton produced at this epoch. The passionate grace of the mermaid before us indicates the growth of freedom and voluptuous feeling in the painter's mind. The breadth, strength, and richness, for example, in the blue drapery, which is an important part of the scheme of the colour, far surpass what seemed possible to the Leighton of earlier years. As the lightness of No. 65 has much of the brilliance of Florence's frescoes and temperas, so the limpid depth and lucent gloom of 'The Mermaid' belong to Venice, and to Venice alone. Anything like over-definition had vanished from Leighton's art by the time this picture was painted.

Count Paris, coming to the house of the Capulets, and finding Juliet apparently dead (62), although a somewhat later work, does not mark so much progress as 'The Mermaid.' Representing a theatrical performance, it is infected with some of the vices of theatrical representation; there is a good deal of exaggeration in the attitudes the expressions (especially those of Count Paris and his friend, a male model to the life) are crude, and the influence of the lamp degrades the chiaroscuro and the light and shade of a picture, the painting proper of which deserved great praise. The breadth and massiveness of touch, which are its best points, are also seen to advantage in a half-length figure of a Roman Lady (59), painted in 1859, which is really a masculine and solid portrait-study of a magnificent Roman model. Originally it was exhibited as a study and called 'La Nanna.' That opacity of the carnations which has offended many in Leighton's later work is almost as marked in this model's face as in the somewhat affected portrait of Mrs. S. Orr (24) painted in 1861. On the other hand, the bonnet and pose of her head are distinct evidence of Leighton's dainty taste. 1862 witnessed the painting of Michael Angelo nursing his Dying Servant (2), by no means a happy nor a spontaneous picture, of which the moribund Urbino is the least good part. It exhibits the defects of No. 24 in technique and sentiment, but hardly any of its better qualities. The Star of Bethlehem (28), 1862, may be grouped with No. 2. Together they affirm a period when Leighton was occupied upon some important task, or was otherwise engaged than in painting. This stationary period continued, as it seems to us, until 1864, when Orpheus and Eurydice (61) indicated the beginning of a stronger style. The "fragment" of verse which Browning wrote to accompany the title of the picture in the Catalogue shows how the poet had been interested by the passion of the group. The face of Eurydice fascinated him as it does us, but that of Orpheus is less attractive, while the painting—vigorous and solid as it is—lacks much the artist was soon to gain.

PETERBOROUGH CATHEDRAL.

A PROTEST against the needless pulling down of the west front has received a great many signatures, and as to it a quaint story reaches us from Peterborough. It is said that a visitor, talking to one of the officials there, asked whether a protest bearing so many well-known names was not entitled to some consideration, and received for answer that it really was of very little consequence, for in all the list there was the name of only one subscriber to the restoration fund. This is a very pretty echo of the Dean and Chapter's own answer to the Society for the Protection of Ancient Buildings early in the controversy, that the Society, not being subscribers to the work, had no claim to be heard about it.

The Society of Antiquaries came forward with a thousand pounds in their hands, but made conditions as to the way in which it was to be spent; and they, too, are refused a hearing. Who then will be listened to? Apparently, they who will meekly lay money at the feet of the five wise men of Peterborough for them and their architects to do what they like with. And yet subscribers do not seem to be crowding in.

The general position remains much as it was last week. The Dean and Chapter still assert their intention to pull down the north gable, but at the time of our writing have not begun to do so. It is said that orders to begin were sent down from London by Mr. Pearson last week, but were countermanded by the authorities on the spot. If this be so, we hope that it may be a sign that the Dean and Chapter are feeling their way to a less uncompromising attitude, and that even yet some means may be found whereby they may be relieved from the very difficult position in which they now are, and the old front of the Cathedral may be saved. The specification prepared for the two defending societies will soon be printed and circulated. If the other side will accept it in the spirit in which it is offered, it may prove an eirenicon.

Mr. Walter Rye writes :—

"Will not the simplest and most effective way to stop the proposed vandalism be for all interested in the preservation of the old work to issue a signed manifesto undertaking not to subscribe a penny towards the rebuilding, and for those who have already subscribed under a misapprehension to write at once and withdraw their subscriptions and send them to Dr. Freshfield's fund?"

Fine-Art Gossip.

We are glad to learn that the Royal Academicians intend that the Winter Exhibition of next year, 1898, shall consist entirely of Millais's works.

Messrs. Clifford & Co. exhibit at 21, Haymarket, until the 30th inst., a collection of water-colour drawings and oil paintings by the Misses C. E. Hughes and B. E. Lewis.—At "The 25 Gallery," 25, Soho Square, there is an exhibition of pictures by, or attributed to, MM. Menzel, Toulouse-Lautrec, L. Legrand, and others.

The following pictures, the acquisition of which by the National Gallery we have already mentioned, have now been hung in their places. The portrait of Gainsborough's daughter, by him, is numbered 1482; his picture of Tristram and Fox is 1483, and his two small landscapes, 1485 and 1486 respectively. The above have been judiciously placed on either side of Zoffany's portrait of Gainsborough, No. 1487. All these, parts of the Lane gift, are in Room XVI. In the Octagon Room the visitor will find the two drawings by Gainsborough, 'Rustics and Donkey' and 'Study of an Old Horse.' With the Lewis Fund Sir E. Poynter has purchased a portrait of Gilbert Stuart, by himself, No. 1480, and 'A Winter Scene,' by H. van Avercamp, No. 1479. The latter is somewhat larger than that other example of the same hand which was already in Trafalgar Square. No. 1481 is a gift, and represents 'A Philosopher,' by C. P. Bega. It is a fairly good specimen of his work. As to Gilbert Stuart, the reader will recollect a life-size, full-length portrait by him of Mr. W. Grant skating in St. James's Park, which attracted much attention when Lord Charles Pelham-Clinton lent it as No. 128 to the Academy in 1878. It was at first attributed to Gainsborough.

At Messrs. Christie, Manson & Woods's on the 6th inst. 'Partie Perdue,' by F. Bracquemond, after J. L. E. Meissonier, brought 28*l.*; and '1806 (Jena),' by J. Jacquet, after the same, 31*l.*

"A life-sized marble bust of the late Master of Balliol, the gift of the Jowett Memorial Committee, was recently placed in the picture gallery of the Bodleian Library. The bust has great merits: there is a lifelike subtlety in the modelling of the face, the rendering of textures is excellent, and the hair, in particular, is treated with a most effective simplicity. Regarded as portraiture, however, the work is not without weaknesses. The contrast between the fragile form and the massive head, which yet was in perfect harmony with it, could perhaps hardly have been indicated by the sculptor here. More to the point is a certain want of that fineness, that distinction, which above all characterized 'the Master's' face, and of the habitual look of power in repose. The personality suggested by the bust is that of a more ordinary man, alert, acute, bold, perhaps masterful; and the pose, like the expression, is full of self-confidence. But the artist, Mr. Hope Pinker, had to deal with a subject of more than ordinary difficulty, and it is perhaps ungracious to lay stress upon defects—or what have seemed to be so—where a faithful and minute record of so much is given. The carefully studied pedestal, of yellow Sienese marble, is most graceful, and well deserves notice. Unfortunately its effect, like that of the bust, is in some degree impaired by its present position and surroundings."

The Pope has, by convention with the Italian Government, become possessed of all the property of the Convent of St. Francis at Assisi, and the schoolboys of the Collegio "Principe di Napoli," who, by the noise they made, used to disturb the monks, are to be, it seems, removed to another building in Assisi.

The excavations of the Athenian Archæological Society near the Dipylon, after the discovery of the ancient road leading to the Academy, have brought to light the remains of a building which is supposed to be the temple of Artemis Calliste. The inscriptions found on the place contain some decrees relating to the priest of this goddess.

From Patras the discovery is announced of a headless marble statue of Minerva which is a copy of the 'Athena' of Pheidias.

M. Homolle has been appointed Director of the French School of Athens for another period of six years.

The owner of the Sciarra Collection has bought from the Italian Government freedom to deal with the rest of his property by surrendering the following works, of which more than one incorrect list has been published: 'A Magdalen,' by Guido; 'The Life of Christ,' by Giotti; 'Peasants of Arcady,' by B. Schidone; 'The Virgin, St. Joseph, and St. Peter, Martyr,' by A. del Sarto; 'Picus changed to a Woodpecker,' by G. da Carpi, and, by the same, 'A Vestal bearing the Statue of Cybele'; 'Church of the Jesuits,' drawing by Gagliardi, figures by A. Sacchi; 'The Virgin with the Sleeping Christ,' by G. Bellini; 'The Vision of Fra Francis da Celano,' by an unknown painter; and a portrait of Stefano Colonna by Bronzino. To this ransom some sculptures in marble and terra cotta are added.

MUSIC

THE WEEK.

Queen's Hall.—Promenade Concerts.
St. James's Hall.—Popular Concerts.

The prodigious Wagnerian programme provided by Mr. Robert Newman last Saturday evening attracted an immense audience, and we can congratulate Mr. Henry J. Wood upon the steady progress made by his large and well-equipped orchestra. Several of the dozen selections from the Bayreuth master were very finely played, notably the Prelude and Death Song from 'Tristan und Isolde,' the "Charfreitagszauber" from 'Parsifal,' the Overture to 'Die Meistersinger,' and the 'Walkürenritt.' Other items well played were the Overture to 'Der Fliegende Holländer,' the new Venusberg music from 'Tannhäuser,' and the "Trauermarsch" from 'Götterdämmerung.' Vocal excerpts were excellently rendered by Miss Lucile Hill and Mr. William Ludwig. The first of the Saturday afternoon Symphony Concerts at the Queen's Hall is to be given on the 30th inst., when a symphony by the Russian composer Glazanow will be performed for the first time in London.

Tschaïkowsky's Pianoforte Trio in A minor, Op. 50, bids fair, as it deserves, to rank with the 'Symphonie Pathétique' alike in its elegiac character and in the beauty and individuality of the music. The work was first performed in London at one of the late Sir Charles Halle's chamber concerts, and was added to the repertory of the Popular Concerts on January 6th last year. On that occasion the pianist, Herr Reisenauer, seemed to think that the trio was a work for the key-board with string accompaniment, but Mr. Leonard Borwick last Monday evening was more reticent, and therefore secured a much better ensemble. The other performers were Lady Halle and Signor Piatti, and a finer performance of a work that improves greatly on acquaintance could not be desired. The programme commenced with Beethoven's Quartet in F minor, Op. 95, and Mr. Leonard Borwick contributed pianoforte pieces by Chopin and Brahms. Miss Evangeline Florence sang in very pleasant fashion an air, "Care selve," from Handel's 'Atalanta,' arranged by A. L.

The Literature of Music. By James E. Matthew. (Stock.)—This little volume is necessarily sketchy, but not by any means trivial in matter. The author commences with the literature of ancient music, and passes on to mediæval writers, and then to works produced during the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries, correcting various errors that have found their way into books of acknowledged authority. Concerning the two celebrated histories of music by Burney and Hawkins, Mr. Matthew rightly records his verdict in favour of the latter, though Hawkins was an amateur and Burney a professional musician. He says Hawkins's style is not so polished, and the work possibly not such amusing reading as that of his rival, but in research and accuracy it need fear no comparison. Burney has never been reprinted, while Hawkins has been issued in a convenient form, with notes which more recent knowledge has rendered necessary, by Messrs. Novello, Ewer & Co.; in this form it is still obtainable, and will be found most useful. Other chapters follow, on dictionaries of music, on the literature of sacred music, of opera, musical instruments, and the bibliography of the art. Of Fétis he says that, although very far from being a safe guide, those who, like himself, have constantly consulted it for years, "must be lost in admiration at the depth and extent of knowledge that it displays." The author is rather severe on Grove's 'Dictionary,' though he admits that the work contains much that is useful and meritorious. The little volume is supplied with a copious index.

We have on our table The Lute of Apollo, an essay on music, by Clifford Harrison (Innes & Co.); Part I. of the Plainsong of the Mass, adapted from the Sarum Gradual (published for the Plainsong and Mediæval Music Society), and containing the principal numbers of the Mass in the Gregorian notation and the four-line staff; and Le Cycle Berlioz, the first volume of a series of monographs upon the work of the gifted if eccentric French composer, by J. G. Prod'homme (Paris, Bibliothèque de l'Association). The last is an essay on 'La Damnation de Faust,' interesting and instructive, though it may not be possible to agree invariably with the author's opinions.

Musical Gossip.

The Crystal Palace Saturday Concerts will be resumed on February 27th and will conclude on April 17th, Mr. August Manns's benefit concert being fixed for the following Saturday. Among the features of the second division of the series will be the interesting Schubert programme on February 27th, the appearance of Herr Joachim on March 13th and M. Paderewski on the following Saturday, and the performance of Gounod's 'Redemption' on March 27th and Mr. Edward Elgar's 'King Olaf' on April 3rd.

The Incorporated Society of Musicians virtually concluded its semi-public proceedings at the Cardiff Conference last week on Thursday. Dr. C. Vincent read a paper on the advantages of sight-singing from the staff, with an appeal to musicians to use the movable Doh system in combination therewith. In the afternoon Mrs. Roeckel addressed the meeting on "some of the advantages of membership" of the association, proving her case eloquently and without difficulty. The Conference was one of the most successful held by the Society, which, it is pleasant to say, is doing much service in the interests of professional and amateur musicians.

Two new overtures from the pen of Mr. Herbert Bunning will be heard in London during the spring. A 'Dramatic Overture' will be introduced at Mr. Manns's benefit concert at the Crystal Palace, and the other, entitled 'Spring and Youth,' will be performed at one of the Philharmonic Concerts.

Concerts were few and unimportant last week until New Year's Day. The afternoon performance of 'Elijah' by the Queen's Hall Choral Society was very largely attended, and in some respects artistically successful. Miss Ella Russell was scarcely at her best in the soprano airs, and Mr. Santley was obviously out of voice at first, but he improved with his work. Miss Ada Crossley made a very favourable impression as an advancing contralto oratorio singer, and Mr. Ben Davies was admirable in the principal tenor music. Mr. Randegger conducted with much spirit, but, we venture to think, took some of the choruses at excessive speed.

In the evening 'The Messiah' was given, as usual, by the Royal Choral Society in the Albert Hall. Miss Anna Williams, Miss Marian McKenzie, Mr. Ben Davies, and Mr. Watkin Mills were the principal vocalists, and Prof. Bridge conducted the curtailed version of Handel's oratorio in a commendable manner. It may be noted that in 'Israel in Egypt,' which is underlined for the 21st inst., the duet "The Lord is a man of war" will be given by two bass soloists, and not by the entire contingent of tenors and basses in the choir.

Messrs. Plunket Greene and Leonard Borwick will give three song and pianoforte recitals at St. James's Hall on February 5th and 19th and March 5th, the first programme being devoted to the music of Schubert.

M. Saint-Saëns's Biblical opera 'Samson et Dalila' seems to be coming rapidly into favour in oratorio form. It was given for the third time at Sir Charles Halle's Manchester Concerts on Wednesday last week, and, as already announced, it will be repeated by the Queen's Hall Choral Society on Saturday afternoon next.

Dvorák's charming overture 'In der Natur' was performed for the first time in Edinburgh by the Scottish Orchestra at Messrs. Paterson's sixth orchestral concert on Monday last. The programme-book contained well-executed portraits of M. Sapellnikoff and Herr Goldmark.

We believe that, for the first time since its institution, the Bristol Festival has yielded a profit. The accounts for the meeting held in October last show a balance on the right side of nearly 43*l.*—not a large sum, it is true, but it is better than a loss, and it is, of course, quite independent of the 142*l.* collected for the local charities.

The recently formed Manchester Royal College of Music seems to be already in a prosperous condition. Last year 1,821*l.* was subscribed towards the funds of the institution, and the number of students rose to 161.

Mr. Frederick Lamond, who has recently won much favour as a pianist in Warsaw and Moscow, will give the first of a series of recitals at St. James's Hall on January 19th.

The new opera 'Messidor,' by MM. Zola and Bruneau, is now in rehearsal at the Paris Opéra, and will probably be produced early in February.

There seems to be irrefragable evidence that Beethoven's great Mass in D was first performed not in Vienna, but by the members of the St. Petersburg Philharmonic Society on March 24th, 1824. The Vienna performance took place six weeks later.

Three cycles of 'Der Ring des Nibelungen' were given last month at Berlin in response to the Kaiser's command, and the Hoftheater was crowded on every evening. The Bayreuth traditions were observed as nearly as possible, and among the artists were Frau Sucher, Madame Gulbranson, Herr Grüning, Herr Vogl, and Herr Lieban. Herr Weingartner is said to have conducted the performances with the utmost skill.

Ibsen's unpleasant play 'Rosmersholm' has inspired a young German composer, Herr Gustav Brecher, to write a symphonic poem, which was recently produced at a concert of the Liszt Verein at Leipzig, it is said with much success.

PERFORMANCES NEXT WEEK.

DRAMA

Dramatic Gossip.

'A Man about Town,' a musical farce, produced on Saturday last at the Avenue, was punningly announced as by Huan Mee. Trivial almost beyond precedent is this piece, which the spirited acting of Miss May Edouin and the dancing of Miss Alice Lethbridge failed to commend.

'A Pierrot's Life,' a play without words, after the fashion of 'L'Enfant Prodigue,' was given on Friday afternoon at the Prince of Wales's by a French company. It is curious to notice that while Pierrot, long popular in France, has obtained from the designs of M. Willette further recognition, and is now treated sentimentally, the character in England remains practically unknown outside the masked ball.

A new play by Mr. Justin Huntly McCarthy will be the next dramatic novelty at the Garrick. Its performance will, however, be preceded by three weeks of Carl Rosa opera.

The title of the piece with which the Strand Theatre (now closed) will reopen, under the management of Mr. John S. Clarke, is to be 'A Prodigal Father,' which is suggestive of 'Un Père Prodigue,' dramatized by Charles Mathews as 'My Awful Dad,' and produced at the Gaiety in September, 1875. Mr. Paulton and Miss May Palfrey, as well as Mr. Collette, will be in the cast. It is to be prefaced by a one-act piece entitled 'Home, Sweet Home,' in which Miss Florence Gerard (Mrs. Abbey) will reappear.

Mr. W. G. Wills's adaptation of 'Esmond,' written for the Lyceum, has long been in existence, and has, we believe, been finished by Mr. Freeman Wills, his brother. It has not yet been acted. Renderings of that not too tractable novel are now promised in both England and America. That to be given in England is by Mr. Edgar Pemberton, and is designed for Mr. Edward Compton.

Mr. George Alexander has secured the rights of the adaptation by M. Armand d'Artois of Musset's 'Lorenzaccio,' in which Madame Bernhardt has been seen in Paris. The English version will be executed by Mr. Herman Merivale.

To-night is to witness the long promised production at the Shaftesbury of 'The Sorrows of Satan' as adapted by Messrs. Herbert Woodgate and Paul Berton, with Mr. Lewis Waller in what we suppose we must call the eponymous hero. It is a curious coincidence that just at the time when 'The Sign of the Cross' is disappearing from one part of Shaftesbury Avenue the latest transfiguration or metempsychosis of the Prince of Darkness should be given at another.

'The Devil's Disciple,' the scene of which is laid in the time of the American War of Independence, is the title of a new play by Mr. George Bernard Shaw, intended, it is to be supposed, for a West-End theatre.

Mr. William Younge, known as an actor and a dramatist, died of pneumonia on Sunday last at Charing Cross Hospital. He wrote several small pieces, and played in various London theatres, being last seen at the Strand in 'Playing the Game,' a piece by himself and Mr. Arthur Flaxman.

Mr. A. F. Robbins writes to point out that the run of 'Our Boys' was longer than that of 'Charley's Aunt,' which was noted a week or two ago as unparalleled.

Writing in the Fortnightly on the 'Blight of the Drama,' Mr. William Archer denies that anything more than chance is responsible for the fact that the fair promise of little more than a year ago is unfulfilled. In the plays by serious dramatists which failed to please the public he finds reasons for want of success in the works themselves, or in the circumstances that attended their production, such as the sudden and perplexing withdrawal of 'Michael and his Lost Angel.' The triumph of the musical comedy he contemplates with equanimity, regarding it as transient, and finding in 'The Sign of the Cross' a far more depressing portent than in 'My Girl' and 'Monte Carlo.' To this we would only add that there is no evidence of change of taste on the part of the public. It is not the drama that 'My Girl,' 'The Circus Girl,' or any other girl supplants. It is the burlesque, the opéra-bouffe, the extravaganza, which it replaces. The very oldest playgoer still recalls the sparkling entertainments of Planché, given at the Olympic or the Lyceum; the man in late middle life talks more frequently of Marie Wilton than of Phelps. Patty Oliver in the 'Black-Eyed Susan' burlesque and Lydia Thompson in 'Magic Toys' prepared the way for the Lettie Linds and other singers and dancers of to-day, of whom we claim no very close knowledge. Such reasons as exist for the decline of the serious drama spring rather from the class of subject treated than from the opposition of the musical comedy, which from the Gaiety, always its home, has put out its feelers and seized for a while on the Garrick, the Prince of Wales's, the Shaftesbury, and one or two other houses.

THE BOOKS PUBLISHED IN GREAT BRITAIN and IRELAND in 1896,

AND THE PRINCIPAL BOOKS PUBLISHED IN AMERICA.

SOME PRESS OPINIONS ON FORMER ISSUES.

"The 'English Catalogue' is a publication of national importance. There is nothing existing that has any claim to be compared with it as a ready guide to the vast fields of modern publications."—Daily News.

"Such a book is immensely useful to all who have to do with the literature of the day."—Athenæum.

"We need scarcely point out how valuable a work of reference this well-known catalogue affords, as it is not only the names of books which are furnished in these pages, but also the dates of publication, an indication of the size, and the name of the publisher. The principal works imported from the United States of America are also included in this admirable volume."—Daily Telegraph.

"'The English Catalogue of Books' is known and appreciated by librarians and those engaged in literary research wherever English books are used, and the new volume of the work is sure of a wide and hearty welcome."—Scotsman.

"To say that it is indispensable to whole classes and interests is mere commonplace. It is in its class the most useful of records.....The entire work is, indeed, a precious record."—Notes and Queries.

VICTORIA CROSS'S SUCCESSFUL NEW NOVEL.

PAULA: a Sketch from Life.
By VICTORIA CROSS.

PAULA: a Sketch from Life.
By VICTORIA CROSS.

PAULA: a Sketch from Life.
By VICTORIA CROSS.

"There are abundant signs in this story that a brilliant literary craftsman has arisen, who is a mistress of swift and telling recital, an observer uncommonly penetrating, and a worker well under control."—Literary World.

"To those who value a novel for its convincingness, or, in other words, freedom from adulteration, it is a keen satisfaction to find a sound piece of work by a new author. 'Paula,' by Victoria Cross, is, in many respects, such a novel. If it is not really a great book, it has very many of the qualities of greatness.....The author calls the novel a sketch from life, and one feels that in the main it is so. In method 'Paula' is realistic, but it is much less dispassionate and impersonal than the work of Mr. George Moore or Mr Gissing. No woman has written better fiction than this for some time past, and I question whether any young writer of either sex has of late shown such remarkable power of insight."—Free Review.

IBSEN'S GREAT DRAMATIC POEM.
Crown 8vo. 3*s.* 6*d.*

—— NAQADA and BALLAS. By W. M. FLINDERS PETRIE and QUIBELL. With a Chapter by F. C. J. SPURRELL. 4to. 79 pp 87 Plates, boards, 25s.

The district treated in this work is about thirty miles North of Thebes and on the Western side of the Nile. Messrs. Flinders Petrie and Quibell give decisive evidence of an hitherto unknown invasion of Upper Egypt, which is linked with the prehistoric civilization of the Mediterranean. An ample index adds greatly to the value of the book.

The GOLDEN LIBRARY.—Square 16mo. cloth, 2s.

CONTRIBUTIONS to a BALLAD HISTORY of ENGLAND.

Athenæum.—"These ballads are spirited and stirring; such are 'The Fall of Harald Hardraada,' 'Old Benbow,' 'Marston Moor,' and 'Corporal John.' 'The soldier's name for the famous Duke of Marlborough which is a specially good ballad. 'Queen Eleanor's Vengeance' is a vividly told story. Coming to more modern times, 'The Deeds of Wellington,' 'Inkermann,' and 'Balaklava' are excellently well said and sung. As a book of ballads, interesting to all who have British blood in their veins, Dr. Bennett's contribution will be welcome. Dr. Bennett's ballads will leave a strong impression on the memory of those who read them."

JOHN FRANCIS AND THE 'ATHENÆUM.'

By JOHN C. FRANCIS.

"A fascinating page of literary history."
Illustrated London News.

"No other fifty years of English literature contain so much to interest an English reader."—Freeman.

"A mine of information on subjects connected with literature for the last fifty years."—Echo.

"Rich in literary and social interest, and afford a comprehensive survey of the intellectual progress of the nation."—Leeds Mercury.

"The entire work affords a comprehensive view of the intellectual life of the period it covers, which will be found extremely helpful by students of English literature."—Christian World.

"A worthy monument of the development of literature during the last fifty years.....The volumes contain not a little specially interesting to Scotsmen."—Scotsman.

"We have put before us a valuable collection of materials for the future history of the Victorian era of English literature."—Standard.

"The thought of compiling these volumes was a happy one, and it has been ably carried out by Mr. John C. Francis, the son of the veteran publisher."
Literary World.

"This literary chronicle of half a century must at once, or in course of a short time, take a place as a permanent work of reference."
Publishers' Circular.

"The volumes abound with curious and interesting statements, and in bringing before the public the most notable features of a distinguished journal from its infancy almost to the present hour, Mr. Francis deserves the thanks of all readers interested in literature."—Spectator.

"It was a happy thought in this age of jubilees to associate with a literary chronicle of the last fifty years a biographical sketch of the life of John Francis.....As we glance through the contents there is scarcely a page which does not induce us to stop and read about the men and events that are summoned again before us."—Western Daily Mercury.

"The book is, in fact, as it is described, a literary chronicle of the period with which it deals, and a chronicle put together with as much skill as taste and discrimination. The information given about notable people of the past is always interesting and often piquant, while it rarely fails to throw some new light on the individuality of the person to whom it refers."—Liverpool Daily Post.

"It is in characters so sterling and admirable as this that the real strength of a nation lies.....The public will find in the book reading which, if light and easy, is also full of interest and suggestion..... We suspect that writers for the daily and weekly papers will find out that it is convenient to keep these volumes of handy size, and each having its own index, extending the one to 20 the other to 30 pages, at their elbow for reference."
Liverpool Mercury.

"No memoir of Mr. Francis would be complete without a corresponding history of the journal with which his name will for ever be identified.....The extraordinary variety of subjects and persons referred to, embracing as they do every event in literature, and referring to every person of distinction in science or letters, is a record of such magnitude that we can only indicate its outlines. To the literary historian the volumes will be of incalculable service."
Bookseller.

"Our survey has been unavoidably confined almost exclusively to the first volume; indeed, anything like an adequate account of the book is impossible, for it may be described as a history in notes of the literature of the period with which it deals. We confess that we have been able to find very few pages altogether barren of interest, and by far the larger portion of the book will be found irresistibly attractive by all who care anything for the history of literature in our own time."
Manchester Examiner.

MESSRS. LONGMANS & CO.'S LIST.

NEW BOOK BY MR. ANDREW LANG.

PICKLE THE SPY;
Or, the Incognito of Prince Charles.

By ANDREW LANG.

With 6 Portraits. 8vo. 18*s.* [Early next week.

 This book is not a novel, though it contains the materials of romance. The subject is the mysterious disappearance of Prince Charles from February 28, 1749, practically till his father's death in 1766. These years, especially 1749–1756, were occupied in European hide-and-seek. The Ambassadors and Courts of Europe, and the spies of England, were helpless, till in 1750 a Highland chief of the highest rank sold himself to the English Government. The book contains his unpublished letters and information, with those of another spy, James Mohr Macgregor, Rob Roy's son. These, combined with the Stuart Papers in Her Majesty's Library at Windsor, the Letters from English Ambassadors in the State Papers, the Political Correspondence of Frederick the Great, and the French Archives, illuminate a chapter in Secret History. The singular story of Macallester the spy also yields some facts, and the whole exhibits the last romance of the Stuarts, and the extremes of loyalty and treason.

GOVERNMENTS and PARTIES in CONTINENTAL EUROPE.

BLICKENSDERFER TYPE-WRITER.

It is NOT a reproduction or hash-up of any existing machines on which the patents have run out.

It is NOT an IMPROVEMENT on them.

It is an entirely new departure in Type-writer mechanism. The root idea in its construction is simplicity; in place of 2 to 3,000 parts it has only about 200. As a result of this simplicity we have a machine which is

PORTABLE (weight 6lb.), SPEEDY, DURABLE, and CHEAP.

It has a complete Key-board, with 84 Letters and Characters. It is fully warranted, and yet it is sold for

MESSRS. LONGMANS & CO.'S LIST.

NEW BOOK BY MR. ANDREW LANG

PICKLE THE SPY;
Or, the Incognito of Prince Charles.
By ANDREW LANG.
With 6 Portraits. 8vo. 18s.

 This book is not a novel, though it contains the materials of romance. The subject is the mysterious disappearance of Prince Charles from February 28, 1749, practically till his father's death in 1766. These years, especially 1749–1756, were occupied in European hide-and-seek. The Ambassadors and Courts of Europe, and the spies of England, were helpless, till in 1750 a Highland chief of the highest rank sold himself to the English Government. The book contains his unpublished letters and information, with those of another spy, James Mohr Macgregor, Rob Roy's son. These, combined with the Stuart Papers in Her Majesty's Library at Windsor, the Letters from English Ambassadors in the State Papers, the Political Correspondence of Frederick the Great, and the French Archives, illuminate a chapter in Secret History. The singular story of Macallester the spy also yields some facts, and the whole exhibits the last romance of the Stuarts, and the extremes of loyalty and treason.

GOVERNMENTS and PARTIES in CONTINENTAL EUROPE.
By A. LAWRENCE LOWELL. 2 vols. 8vo. 21s.
"Mr. Lawrence Lowell has rendered a service to the student of European politics. His aim has been to explain briefly the relation between the development of political parties and the mechanism of modern government in the principal European States."—Times.

SECOND EDITION.

The GIRLHOOD of MARIA JOSEPHA HOLROYD (LADY STANLEY of ALDERLEY), as told in Letters of a Hundred Years Ago, from 1776 to 1796. With 6 Portraits. 8vo. 18s.
"We strongly recommend this work to those who love a racy picture of their grandparents' lives."—Spectator.

ADVENTURES of ROGER L'ESTRANGE. Edited by DOMINICK DALY. With Preface by H. M. STANLEY, M.P. 6s.

"Everything that a modern adventure story should possess is here. There is even a love interest so prettily developed and so entirely satisfactory that a hand of a Stevenson or a Crockett might have set it down. Fenimore Cooper has written no more convincing account of the horrors of Indian torture and imprisonment. The style is the style of Defoe with much of Defoe's simple charm."—Daily Chronicle.

"The object of the writers has been to supply the information required by students preparing for examination, and to present it in a form sufficiently attractive to appeal also to the general reader. The plays are those most frequently selected for study in schools, and the details usually relegated to notes and appendices will be found incorporated in the text." Extract from Preface.

'TOM JONES' FOR FAMILY READING.

TOM JONES: the History of a Foundling. By Henry FIELDING. Adapted for Family Reading by his Great-Granddaughter, J. E. M. FIELDING. 6s.

"Miss Fielding has performed a useful service in preparing an expurgated 'Tom Jones.' Fielding is thus for the first time made accessible to an important section of the reading public. The volume preserves the spirit while preserving the very language of the author. Had Fielding lived it is no great feat of imagination to fancy his doing for himself what has been so successfully done by his descendant."—Daily Chronicle.

The FARM in the KAROO: a Sketch of South African Life. By Mrs. CAREY-HOBSON. Illustrated. 2s. 6d.

Now ready, at all Booksellers' and Libraries,

MR. EDWARD CLODD'S NEW BOOK.

FROM

THALES TO HUXLEY.

With an Intermediate Chapter on the CAUSES OF ARREST OF THE MOVEMENT.

By EDWARD CLODD,
President of the Folk-lore Society, Author of 'The Childhood of the World,' 'The Story of Creation,' &c.

Illustrated with Portraits (executed in Photogravure) of Charles Darwin, Professor Huxley, Mr. Alfred Russel Wallace, and Mr. Herbert Spencer.

"*" DARWIN'S THEORY of the ORIGIN of SPECIES was published nearly forty years ago. The generation which has arisen since then knows little or nothing of the storm which that event aroused; how the "drum ecclesiastic" was beaten, and the world shaken in divers other ways. Hence the story of the "famous victory" should have interest for present-day readers; and it is with this story that this book is largely concerned. But as leading up to modern discoveries and their momentous results, it is needful to trace their source to the Ionian seaboard some twenty-five centuries back; and, as explaining the lateness of the product, it is further needful to show the retarding action of Christian dogma for sixteen hundred years. One important feature of the book is the reference to some original documents, which Mr. Herbert Spencer has shown the author, by means of which certain facts are for the first time made public.

READY ON JANUARY 20,
THE FIRST TWO VOLUMES OF
MR. GRANT ALLEN'S HISTORICAL GUIDES.

PARIS. | FLORENCE.

Extract from Mr. Allen's Introduction to the Series:—
"The object and plan of these historical handbooks is somewhat different from that of any other guides at present before the public. They do not compete with such existing works; they are rather intended to supplement than to supplant them.....I desire to supply the tourist who wishes to use his travel as a means of culture with such historical and antiquarian information as will enable him to understand, and therefore to enjoy, the architecture, sculpture, painting, and minor arts of the towns he visits."

Forty-one Years in India: from Subaltern to Commander-in-Chief. By Field-Marshal Lord Roberts of Kandahar, V.C., G.C.B. 2 vols. (Bentley & Son.)

(Second Notice.)

ON the 26th of October, 1857, the movable column arrived at Cawnpore, and for the first time Lord Roberts heard the details of that great tragedy, and saw the sights which had driven our soldiers mad. But the day after the arrival of the Delhi column orders reached Hope Grant from Sir Colin Campbell to get into communication with the Alambagh, a garden house surrounded by a lofty wall, where Havelock and Outram had left their sick and wounded and spare stores. On the 31st of October Hope Grant left Cawnpore and crossed the Ganges, but the next day the Brigadier was bidden to halt until the Commander-in-Chief should arrive. On the 9th of November Sir Colin joined the column accompanied by his chief of the staff, Brigadier-General Mansfield. The following morning arrived Kavanagh, the brave Irishman, who, disguised as a native, had passed through the enemy's lines. He brought a letter from Outram stating his views with regard to the route that should be followed by Sir Colin Campbell, in which the line proposed was clearly marked. Sir Colin readily accepted Outram's plan of advance, and strictly adhered to it. On the morning of the 12th the column began its march to the Alambagh, and after halting there for two days to perfect the smallest detail, Sir Colin Campbell set forth for the relief of the Residency. By noon on the 14th he had occupied the Dilkusha and Martinière, where he fixed his headquarters. The next day was devoted to making preparations for a further advance. In the evening Roberts was told that the Commander-in-Chief desired his presence at the Martinière. On reporting himself to his Excellency, Sir Colin Campbell informed him that he was not satisfied that a sufficient reserve of small-arm ammunition had been brought with the force, and that the only chance of getting more in time was to send back to the Alambagh for it that night. Sir Colin asked Roberts if he thought he could find his way back in the dark. "I answered, 'I am sure I can.'" The Commander-in-Chief impressed upon him strongly the necessity for caution, told him that he might take what escort he thought necessary, but that whatever happened he must be back by daybreak, as he had signalled to Outram that the force would advance on the morrow. The old Scotsman grimly desired that the ordnance officer whose fault it was that sufficient ammunition had not been brought should go back with Roberts and be left at the Alambagh. Accompanied by the unfortunate ordnance officer, Younghusband, Gough, two squadrons of cavalry, and 150 camels, Roberts started at 9 P.M. for the Alambagh. After an adventurous ride in the dark, the Alambagh was reached, and at dawn he returned with the ammunition, and as he rode up to the Martinière he could see old Sir Colin, only partially dressed, standing on the steps in evident anxiety at his not having arrived. He congratulated him on the success of the expedition, and told him to get something to eat as quickly as possible, for they were to start directly the men had breakfasted :—

"I went off to the Artillery camp, and refreshed the inner man with a steak cut off a gun bullock which had been killed by a round shot on the 14th."

As soon as the men had breakfasted on the 16th the force advanced. Roberts was ordered to accompany the advance guard, behind which rode Sir Colin, who had Kavanagh with him, as his general knowledge of the locality proved of great service. As the force was feeling its way along a narrow and tortuous lane it reached a corner which turns sharply to the left, and winding round it the British were suddenly deluged by a storm of bullets from the Secundar Bagh. The bank was so steep that it seemed impossible for artillery to ascend it. But men and horses did manage to clamber up it, the guns opened fire, and in an hour a breach was made. The bugle sounded for the assault :—

"It was a magnificent sight, a sight never to be forgotten—that glorious struggle to be the first to enter the deadly breach, the prize to the winner of the race being certain death! Highlanders and Sikhs, Punjabi Mahomedans, Dogras and Pathans, all vied with each other in the generous competition. A Highlander was the first to reach the goal, and was shot dead as he jumped into the enclosure; a man of the 4th Punjab Infantry came next, and met the same fate. Then followed Lieutenant Cooper, of the 93rd, and immediately behind him his Colonel (Ewart), Captain Lumsden, of the 30th Bengal Infantry, and a number of Sikhs and Highlanders as fast as they could scramble through the opening. A drummer-boy of the 93rd must have been one of the first to pass that grim boundary between life and death, for when I got in I found him just inside the breach, lying on his back quite dead—a pretty, innocent-looking, fair-haired lad, not more than fourteen years of age."

A party made a rush for the gateway, the doors of which were on the point of being closed, when a Mohammedan (Mukarrab Khan by name)

"pushed his left arm, on which he carried a shield, between them, thus preventing their being shut; on his hand being badly wounded by a sword-cut, he drew it out, instantly thrusting in the other arm, when the right hand was all but severed from the wrist. But he gained his object—the doors could not be closed, and were soon forced open altogether, upon which the 4th Punjab Infantry, the 53rd, 93rd, and some of the Detachments, swarmed in."

Roberts entered immediately behind the storming party, and the scene that ensued, he states, "requires the pen of a Zola to depict." The pen of Tolstoi would do it more justice :—

"The rebels, never dreaming that we should stop to attack such a formidable position, had collected in the Sikandarbagh to the number of upwards of 2,000, with the intention of falling upon our right flank as soon as we should become entangled amongst the streets and houses of the Hazratganj. They were now completely caught in a trap, the only outlets being by the gateway and the breach, through which our troops continued to pour. There could therefore be no thought of escape, and they fought with the desperation of men without hope of mercy, and determined to sell their lives as dearly as they could. Inch by inch they were forced back to the pavilion, and into the space between it and the north wall, where they were all shot or bayoneted. There they lay in a heap as high as my head, a heaving, surging mass of dead and dying inextricably entangled. It was a sickening sight, one of those which even in the excitement of battle and the flush of victory make one feel strongly what a horrible side there is to war. The wretched wounded men could not get clear of their dead comrades, however great their struggles, and those near the top of this ghastly pile of writhing humanity vented their rage and disappointment on every British officer who approached by showering upon him abuse of the grossest description."

After the capture of the Secundar Bagh the troops, fighting for every inch of the ground, proceeded to the Shah Najaf mausoleum, enclosed by high masonry loopholed walls, and reached it as the afternoon was waning. Sir Colin Campbell desired to carry it before nightfall, and Barnston was instructed to bring up his battalion of detachments under cover of the guns. As the troops advanced in skirmishing order their leader fell, and it was seen that the men were wavering :—

"Norman [General Sir Henry Norman] was the first to grasp the situation. Putting spurs to his horse, he galloped into their midst, and called on them to pull themselves together; the men rallied at once, and advanced into the cover from which they had for the moment retreated. I had many opportunities for noting Norman's coolness and presence of mind under fire. On this particular occasion these qualities were most marked, and his action was most timely."

More infantry were brought up without avail. The afternoon was passing away, and it seemed essential to carry the Shah Najaf. The old chief placed himself at the head of the 93rd, and under a heavy fire led them to some cover in close proximity to the walls. The naval guns were dragged by the seamen and the Madras Fusiliers close to the walls, and commenced to breach. The enemy at length lost heart, and fled out the other side, so that an entrance was effected without difficulty.

Night came on, and the troops lay down in lines with their arms. Next morning the contest was renewed. Fire was opened on the mess-house, and in the afternoon it was captured. As from thence the advancing troops could see the British flag flying on the positions captured by Sir J. Outram the previous day, Lord Roberts states Sir Colin Campbell ordered him to procure a regimental colour and place it on one of the turrets of the building:—

"I rode off accordingly to the 2nd Punjab Infantry, standing close by, and requested the Commandant, Captain Green, to let me have one of his colours. He at once complied, and I galloped with it to the mess-house. As I entered, I was met by Sir David Baird (one of Sir Colin's Aides-de-camp), and Captain Hopkins, of the 53rd Foot, by both of whom I was assisted in getting the flag with its long staff up the inconveniently narrow staircase, and in planting it on the turret nearest the Kaiserbagh, which was about 850 yards off. No sooner did the enemy perceive what we were about, than shot after shot was aimed at the colour, and in a very few minutes it was knocked over, falling into the ditch below. I ran down, picked it up, and again placed it in position, only for it to be once more shot down and hurled into the ditch, just as Norman and Lennox (who had been sent by Sir Colin to report what was going on in the interior of the Kaiserbagh) appeared on the roof. Once more I picked up the colour, and found that this time the staff had been broken in two. Notwithstanding, I managed to prop it up a third time on the turret, and it was not again hit, though the enemy continued to fire at it for some time."

Norman and Roberts obtained permission to accompany Havelock to the Residency, and the autobiography gives a graphic account of the sight which they saw as they entered it. When the news of General Windham's reverse reached the retiring army, Sir Colin Campbell, becoming impatient to learn the exact state of the case, desired Roberts to ride on as far as he could to the river, and if he found the bridge broken to return at once, but if it were still in existence to cross over, try to see the general, and bring back all the information he could obtain. Roberts started, took two sowars, found the bridge intact, pushed across, and got into the entrenchments. He was about to return to headquarters, when loud cheers broke from the men, caused by the appearance of the Commander-in-Chief. Sir Colin Campbell, having grown impatient, had pushed on with his staff. An excellent description of their ride is to be found in General Sir Henry Norman's able lecture on 'The Relief of Lucknow.' Sir Colin Campbell, having dispatched the women, children, and wounded to Allahabad, attacked and defeated the Gwalior contingent. Roberts watched the advance as one of the chief's staff, and took part in the chase after the flying enemy, which the old chief himself headed.

On the 23rd of December Sir Colin Campbell commenced his march towards Fatehgarh; and on the morning of the 2nd of January, 1858, a strong force of the rebels were found posted at the village of Khudaganj. As our troops advanced the enemy hastily limbered up their guns and retired. A hot pursuit followed:—

"The chase continued for nearly five miles, until daylight began to fail and we appeared to have got to the end of the fugitives, when the order was given to wheel to the right and form up on the road. Before, however, this movement could be carried out, we overtook a batch of mutineers, who faced about and fired into the squadron at close quarters. I saw Younghusband fall, but I could not go to his assistance, as at that moment one of his sowars was in dire peril from a sepoy who was attacking him with his fixed bayonet, and had I not helped the man and disposed of his opponent, he must have been killed. The next moment I descried in the distance two sepoys making off with a standard, which I determined must be captured, so I rode after the rebels and overtook them, and while wrenching the staff out of the hands of one of them, whom I cut down, the other put his musket close to my body and fired; fortunately for me it missed fire, and I carried off the standard."

A brief note states: "For these two acts I was awarded the Victoria Cross."

When it was decided that the siege of Lucknow was to be undertaken at once, Sir Colin Campbell issued a general order detailing the regiments, staff, and commanders who were to take part in it. Major-General Hope Grant was appointed to the command of the cavalry division, and Roberts remained with him as Deputy-Assistant-Quartermaster-General. He commends the scientific manner in which the siege operations were carried out by Robert Napier, and also the good use which Sir Colin Campbell made of his powerful force of artillery. He, however, blames Sir Colin for checking Outram's proposed advance across the iron bridge, which would have rendered the defeat of the enemy more complete. The capture of Lucknow found Roberts feeling the ill effects of exposure to the climate and hard work, and the doctors insisted on a trip to England:—

"On the 1st April, the sixth anniversary of my arrival in India, I made over my office to Wolseley, who succeeded me as Deputy-Assistant-Quartermaster-General on Hope Grant's staff, and towards the middle of the month I left Lucknow."

The well-earned rest was enjoyed in the county of Waterford, where his father was at the time residing. On the 17th of May, 1859, he was married to her "without whose loving help my 'Forty-one Years in India' could not be the happy retrospect it is." On the 30th of July, 1859, Roberts and his wife returned to India. In 1863 he was again employed on active service in the Umbeyla expedition, of which he gives an interesting account. The Commander-in-Chief sent in his name for a brevet, "but the Viceroy refused to forward the recommendation, for the reason that I was 'too junior to be made a lieutenant-colonel.' I was then thirty-two!" During the Abyssinian expedition Major Roberts served as senior staff officer at Zula, and after Magdala was taken, Sir Robert Napier made him the bearer of his final despatches. On reaching London he took them to Sir Stafford Northcote, then Secretary of State for India, who, after reading them, asked him to take them without delay to the Commander-in-Chief:—

"There was a dinner-party, however, that night at Gloucester House, and the servant told me it was quite impossible to disturb His Royal Highness; so, placing my card on the top of the despatches, I told the man to deliver them at once, and went back to my club. I had scarcely reached it, when the Duke's Aide-de-camp made his appearance and told me that he had been ordered to find me and take me back with him. The Commander-in-Chief received me very kindly, expressing regret that I had been sent away in the first instance; and Their Royal Highnesses the Prince and Princess of Wales, who were present, were most gracious, and asked many questions about the Abyssinian Expedition."

Towards the end of February, 1869, Roberts returned to Simla, and two years after he took part in the Lushai expedition, and a C.B. was conferred on him for his services. In 1875 Lord Napier nominated him to the coveted post of Quartermaster-General. The next year he accompanied the Commander-in-Chief to Bombay on the eve of his departure, and while he was bidding Lord Napier farewell, the Orontes steamed into the harbour with Lord Lytton on board:—

"Little did I imagine when making Lord Lytton's acquaintance how much he would have to say to my future career. His Excellency received me very kindly, telling me he felt that I was not altogether a stranger, as he had been reading during the voyage a paper I had written for Lord Napier, a year or two before, on our military position in India, and the arrangements that would be necessary in the event of Russia attempting to continue her advance south of the Oxus. Lord Napier had sent a copy of this memorandum to Lord Beaconsfield, by whom it had been given to Lord Lytton."

Lord Roberts maintains, as most men who have studied the subject maintain, that Lord Lytton's frontier policy, though at the time much misunderstood and criticized, was in essentials sound. But these are matters which must be left for final settlement in the calm court of history. When the second Afghan war began General Roberts, on account of the ability he had shown as Quartermaster-General, was appointed to command the Kuram field force, taking its name from one of the passes through which our forces invaded Afghanistan. To take a man from the desk to command an army in the field is a hazardous experiment, but in this case it was fully justified by success. On the 21st of November, 1878, he made his first advance into Afghanistan, and nine days afterwards he found the enemy in large numbers well posted in the Peiwar Kotal. "It was indeed a formidable position," and General Roberts determined to turn it by a flank movement. After considerable difficulty this was done with success, and General Roberts found no enemy up to the Shutar Gardan Pass to oppose his advance to Kabul. The Ameer, hearing of the successful advance of the English columns, quitted Kabul for Turkistan. On January 21st, 1879, death put an end to the troubles of Shere Ali, and Yakub, his son, reigned in his stead. On the 26th of May, at Gandamak, a treaty was signed in the British camp by the Ameer and by Major Cavagnari on behalf of the British Government. Roberts returned to Simla, and he was deep in the work of the Army Commission when news came of the massacre of our envoy at Kabul. Immediate steps were taken to retrieve the disaster. General Massy was ordered to seize again the Shutar Gardan Pass, and General Stewart was told to reoccupy Kandahar, which had been almost entirely evacuated. On the 29th of September General Roberts again took command of the Kuram force, which advanced as rapidly as possible, and on the evening of October 5th the village of Charasiab, eleven miles from Kabul, was reached, and a stirring narrative of the fight which ensued fills several pages. At Charasiab, as in every battle of the campaign, there were some fine examples of individual heroism. Private MacMahon, of the 72nd Highlanders —who bore the brunt of the fighting almost single-handed—scaled a hill, on the crest of which was a sungur filled with men. Major White (now General Sir George White, Commander-in-Chief of the Indian Army), of the same regiment, not caring to expose his men on a particularly steep bit of ground which was enfiladed by a few Afghans, posted in rear of some rocks, took a rifle from one of his men, and stalked the enemy single-handed. Both men received the Victoria Cross.

After Charasiab the enemy made no further stand, and General Roberts took possession of Kabul one month after the murder of Cavagnari, and for two months after the entry of the English into the Afghan capital no apprehension was entertained of any organized resistance to the occupation. Men are apt to forget that no one decisive battle ever subdued a brave and warlike nation. The work of the Normans only began after Senlac. In December tidings of general disaffection among the tribes began to reach the invaders, and to check the growing discontent a grand review of all the troops at Kabul was held on the 9th. The same afternoon a brigade was sent due west to Arghandeh to drive back the Afghan general, Mahomed Jan, who was reported to be attempting a junction with the Kohistanis from the north. On the next day General Baker's brigade marched south to Charasiab. General Massy was told "that he was to advance cautiously and quietly by the road leading directly from the city of Kabul towards Arghandeh, feeling for the enemy; that he was to communicate with Macpherson and act in conformity with that officer's movements; and I impressed upon him that he was on no account to commit himself to an action until Macpherson had engaged the enemy."

General Massy, Lord Roberts states, did not follow the route he was told to take, and marching straight across the country he found himself face to face with the enemy before he could join Macpherson. General Roberts, warned by the firing that an engagement was taking place, galloped across the Chardeh valley, and on gaining the open ground beyond the village of Bhagwana, he saw that "an unbroken line, extending for about two miles, and formed of not less than between 9,000 and 10,000 men, was moving rapidly towards me, all on foot save a small body of Cavalry on their left flank—in fact, the greater part of Mahomed Jan's army. To meet this formidable array, instead of Macpherson's and Massy's forces, which I hoped I should have found combined, there were but 4 guns, 198 of the 9th Lancers under Lieutenant-Colonel Cleland, 40 of the 14th Bengal Lancers under Captain Philip Neville, and at some little distance Gough's troop of the 9th Lancers, who were engaged in watching the enemy's Cavalry."

The fight went on the whole day, and at dusk the little force had foiled the enemy's attempt to reach Kabul. But their standards floated on the hills around, and next day attacks were made in order to dislodge the enemy from them. The Afghans were immensely superior in numbers and fought well, while nothing could be finer than the pluck displayed by our men; they were, however, called on to carry positions which they had to give up immediately afterwards on account of the overwhelming force brought against them, as was the case at the conical hill of which Lord Roberts supplies a vivid description. After three days of combat he had to retire to his cantonments at Sherpur, two miles north of the city, and was compelled with five thousand men to defend a position nearly five miles long, some two miles of which had no further protection than a slight shallow trench, hastily constructed at a critical moment. On the 23rd of December the enemy made a desperate effort to take the entrenchment by assault, but were repulsed by the steady fire of the defenders. Then news reached them of the approach of Gough's reinforcing column, and they dispersed, and our troops were once more in Kabul. During the winter months General Roberts strengthened his position. In May, 1880, Ayub Khan, the brother of Yakub, marched on Kandahar, and at the end of July news reached Kabul of the Maiwand disaster. On the 6th of August the Kabul-Kandahar field force began its famous march. On August 31st Sir Frederick Roberts reached Kandahar, and on September 1st he defeated Ayub outside the walls. In order to relieve the garrison General Roberts had given up all reliance on a base of operations, and with a force of ten thousand men marched through the heart of a hostile country three hundred and eighteen miles in twenty-three days. Such a feat will always be remembered. Its accomplishment was greatly facilitated by the previous daring march of Sir D. Stewart from Kandahar to Kabul, and the generous manner in which he handed over his tried troops to Sir Frederick Roberts. President Lincoln, on hearing a discussion as to the respective merits of Sherman and Grant, remarked, "I should have thought there was sufficient glory to cover both." There is quite sufficient glory to cover both Sir Donald Stewart and Lord Roberts.

At the close of the Afghan campaign Sir Frederick Roberts returned to England, and "was fêted and feasted to almost an alarming extent." In 1881 he went to the Cape of Good Hope, having been nominated by Mr. Gladstone's Government Governor of Natal and Commander of the Forces in South Africa on the death of Sir George Colley and the receipt of the news of the disaster at Majuba Hill:—

"While I was on my way out to take up my command, peace was made with the Boers in the most marvellously rapid and unexpected manner. A peace, alas! 'without honour,' to which may be attributed the recent regrettable state of affairs in the Transvaal—a state of affairs which was foreseen and predicted by many at the time. My stay at Cape Town was limited to twenty-four hours, the Government being apparently as anxious to get me away from Africa as they had been to hurry me out there."

On the 27th of November, 1881, he returned to India as Commander-in-Chief of the Madras Army, having refused the appointment of Quartermaster-General at the Horse Guards. Two years after he succeeded Sir Donald Stewart as Commander-in-Chief in India. During the eight years he held that responsible office he laboured strenuously to make the army he commanded as perfect a fighting machine as possible, and to improve the condition of the British soldier and the Sepoy. As head of the executive he never let any petty jealousy obstruct the difficult and delicate path of army reform; but in conjunction with General Chesney, a great administrator and man of genius, he, with characteristic loyalty, materially helped to carry out those military reforms which marked the administration of Lord Lansdowne. In 1893 Lord Roberts's splendid career of forty-one years in India came to a close, and he left the land in which he had worked so long, having won the love of the soldier and Sepoy, the attachment of the native chiefs, and the admiration and confidence of the European community.

Climbing Reminiscences of the Dolomites. By Leone Sinigaglia. With Introduction by Edward J. Garwood. Translated by M. A. Vialls. (Fisher Unwin.)

To judge by the issue of volumes dealing not with mountains, but with "mountaineering" (the distinction is real and deep), it would almost seem that mountaineers were becoming as numerous as verse-writers, and that, like minor poets, they bought one another's works. Their case is the more remarkable, for the purchase must involve a far heavier charge both on their purses and their bookshelves. The last of the portly volumes dedicated to modern mountaineering is a translation from the Italian. Signor Sinigaglia is an ardent climber, and he has written what is purely a climber's book. He is clear, accurate, and modest in his account of his own doings, and he knows all about his predecessors' ascents. His chapters might rank as excellent articles in any Alpine club journal, or would serve as first-rate material for a 'Climber's Guide.'

Within the limits he sets himself his work is well done. These limits are, however, narrow in more senses than one. His climbs were all in the Cortina and Sexten districts, and his descriptions are confined to his climbs. He tells his readers, it is true, of "visions of magnificent valleys rich with lofty aged pines, of deep emerald-green lakes, of white villages with stately campaniles and shining roof tops, of the distant clear Dolomite spires in a thousand shapes, with bold pinnacles, indented crests, irregular towers, needles, and precipitous walls, all of the strangest form and colour, outlined on the transparent sky of Tyrol."

But this is the only distant or general view the reader gets of the region, and it is on the last page. His interest is elsewhere claimed for the solution of

"new problems in steep, often appallingly steep, walls, aerial crests, strange chimneys, and dizzy traverses, that need serious, intense, and energetic application to overcome."

"Dimai, alone and unroped, as is his invariable way when climbing, attacks this slab of rock. We note from the beginning that our brave guide is obliged to make violent efforts to drag himself up, working with finger-nails, elbows, and knees sticking close to the rock, making extraordinary exertions, and yet gaining ground with unusual slowness.....I go up in my turn. Following the example of the guides, I have put on the 'Kletterschuhe' [string shoes], but (unlooked-for mischance!) there is nothing they can stick to from the base upwards of the rock slab, so smooth its surface. By dint of frantic working of knees and elbows, with finger tips fixed in the limited and awkward holds, I succeed in making way, though slowly, up this terrible rock-face, and after much hard work, crawling penitent-wise, I get near the guides. Cragsmen should arrange to climb this toilsome rock-face—fortunately not a dizzy one, otherwise it would be very bad—without shoes. At any rate it could easily be avoided.....But every good climber will look upon it as a duty to attempt it."

Surely this is the very midsummer madness of climbing, mountaineering in extremis! Yet the reader is told that such delights have moved the hearts of at least five ladies, one of them an Italian duchess, "to figure wonderfully as impromptu climbers." Possibly the perils were chiefly for their leaders, for in much Dolomite climbing it is on the leader that the strain chiefly falls.

Those who care for the conscientious record of a cragsman's adventures will find plenty of excitement in the two hundred pages of Signor Sinigaglia's volume. By way of contrast they may turn to the topographical description of the noble Pelmo, which has no charms for the new school, and is libelled in a most unfortunate plate. The famous corner described by Mr. Ball and in Mr. Douglas Freshfield's 'Italian Alps' has been "simplified for the benefit of families and young people," and the mountain, we are told, is now, "from a climber's point of view, devoid of interest, the ascent being in fact nothing more than an ordinary constitutional."

The views, copiously supplied, have been well selected as illustrations of the text; but they have been chosen without any eye to composition or artistic effect, which may be studied even in dealing with photographs. They miss the characteristic beauty of the region and the grandeur of its loftier summits, though some of them do partial justice to the quaintness of outline of the "Little Dolomites," amongst which the author finds his most fascinating problems. The frontispiece is a fine photogravure, but the process employed for the rest of the plates has in no case produced pleasing results, and in many has entirely failed. An adequate and intelligible district map has been supplied, and the translation is readable, spirited, and as a whole grammatical. "Monaco" on p. 19 should obviously be Munich.

The volume is introduced to English readers—perhaps needlessly—by Mr. Garwood in a somewhat lengthy preface, dated from Advent Bay, Spitzbergen. Owing, possibly, to his temporary distance from a library, Mr. Garwood has hazarded some statements which a further consideration of facts and dates might have led him to modify. His opening sentence, if not absolutely inaccurate, will certainly convey an erroneous impression to most readers. Seventeen years ago, he says, "the list of Dolomite peaks of which the ascent had been authentically recorded was not an extensive one, and comprised for the most part the loftiest summits only in each group of the district." Any one who cares to count up the peaks ascended before 1880 and the "Little Dolomites" climbed since will recognize the injustice Mr. Garwood has done to the work of his predecessors. Mr. Garwood is, it would appear, but imperfectly acquainted not only with the recorded feats, but also with the "expressed opinions," of some of the older generation of mountaineers. He fancies that they maintain that "to the enjoyment of mountain climbing as a sport difficulties of ascent, such, that is to say, as are due to steepness of inclination or absence of hand and foot hold, are not essential"; that such difficulties "are to be condemned as requiring gymnastic exercises degrading to the dignity of the true mountaineer." Mr. Garwood may be reminded of a passage in an Alpine classic—the late Mr. J. Ball's 'Eastern Alps' (edition 1868, p. 511):—

"It must be owned that the chief inducement to the ascents of the peaks of this region [the Cortina Dolomites] is in the climb itself. When the cragsman has acquired a little familiarity with the rock, so as not to feel uneasy in places where the surface is rotten and pieces are detached by the hand, he gets to prefer dolomite climbing to all other rock work, finding it provide far more of excitement and variety than the crystalline slates or even granite."

The old mountaineer can enjoy, and has enjoyed, the "sport" of a hard wrestle either with rocks, or with iceslopes, or with storm and wind. He is not as a rule encumbered with any morbid feelings about his own or his comrades' dignity. If Mr. Garwood will include in his definition of difficulties those of snow and ice and weather, the old mountaineer will certainly agree with him that there is no "sport" in pounding up Mont Blanc or the Ortler on a fine day. But to their true lovers (and herein is the root of the difference) the mountains are more than a gymnasium, and mountaineering is more than a sport: it is a branch of travel, and a gate to new forms of natural beauty. And in the recent specialization of mountaineering—in the tendency to look on proficiency in rock scrambling as constituting a qualification for any mountain ascent or exploration, and in the consequent decay in icecraft among both guides and mountaineers—the pioneers of the Alps recognize not only a danger in the future, but the cause of several recent and most lamentable catastrophes. A cragsman is not necessarily a mountaineer, and is often without many of the most essential qualities of an explorer.

Great Public Schools. By Various Authors. (Arnold.)

Ten public schools, their history, their sports, and their normal life, are described in this volume with varying degrees of fulness. The ten selected are Eton, Harrow, Charterhouse, Cheltenham, Rugby, Clifton, Westminster, Marlborough, Haileybury, Winchester. Most readers, we think, will wonder, not without reason, that no place has been found in such a hierarchy for St. Paul's and Shrewsbury. Chronologically also the order seems fantastic: to begin with Eton, to put Clifton before Westminster, to end with Winchester, is to make a mere tangle of history; if the list does not begin at the end, it certainly ends at the beginning. Neither is the book properly brought up to date. Whatever may have been the case when Mr. Maxwell Lyte wrote the first paper, on 'Eton College: Historical and Descriptive,' he would not now proclaim that the venerable Fellow, Mr. Wilder, "still survives" (p. 24). In the third paper Mr. Alfred Lyttelton will shudder at finding himself responsible for calling a well-known institution at Eton "the parliament of 'Fop'" (p. 40), though he almost deserves his disaster for completely misunderstanding Matthew Arnold's joke about "the young barbarians," and protesting that Eton boys are civilized, whatever Oxonians may be! Mr. Arnold by "barbarians" meant aristocrats, as distinguished from "philistines" and "populace." Etonians with a sense of humour may well pray to be saved from their friends.

Nevertheless, a book which contains the excellent paper on 'Rugby School, 1567–1842 A.D.,' by "Tom Brown" (an excellent portrait of whom forms the frontispiece of the volume); the pleasant sketch, all too short, of 'Harrow School, 1829–1889,' by the present Master of Trinity College, Cambridge (pp. 77–86); the introduction by the late Lord Selborne to Mr. Gale's account of Winchester—in which, by a strange slip (p. 309), the numbers of the school are exaggerated by nearly one hundred; and the vivid account of Westminster, by Mr. Russell Barker, beautifully illustrated by Mr. Railton—such a book, we say, is interesting to any public-school man. If there is a fault common more or less to all these papers, it is one which is, perhaps, akin to a virtue. They are written by enthusiasts, who touch too gently, or not at all, on the seamy side of public-school life and the historic scandals of old institutions. Mr. Mowbray Morris, for instance, on p. 53, dismisses the darker side of his subject by murmuring, "We have changed all that now, and no one and nothing is served by raking together these Portions and parcels of the dreadful past."

This natural mood of retrospective toleration has given a long lease to barbaric survivals: few places have suffered so much as public schools from the want of a healthy breeze of outside opinion. Their reform has been tardy and partial, through the want of humour and the rigid oppressiveness that always characterize an athletic régime.

Few non-Etonians, we suspect, know how narrowly Eton on several occasions escaped the wrath or greed of the monarchy. Edward IV.—regarding it as "a Lancastrian foundation"—was within an ace of suppressing it; Henry VIII. and his successor both meditated its plunder, but stayed their hands; Queen Elizabeth was contented to impose upon it "a layman and an alien"—Henry Savile, of Merton College—as Provost, and, as it turned out, a right good one; later on, Bacon was nearly elected, but Sir Henry Wotton was preferred. But no monarch or Protector did Eton such disservice as her own collegiate Fellows. Generous as individual Fellows were, the collective body was sordidly rapacious. Less than sixty years ago, "the interests of the scholars were sacrificed to those of the Provost, Fellows, and head master" to such a degree that the life of a colleger was "almost intolerable." In 1841 matters had reached such a pass that, notwithstanding the prospective advantages of being on the foundation, there were thirty-five vacancies and only two candidates!

The older foundation of Winchester suffered in precisely the same way, to a more recent date still, from the absorption of its revenues by a handful of non-resident Fellows, and the consequent squalor of the life in college and the crippling of the educational resources of the school. The moral of these things is plain—a foundation for the instruction of youth cannot prosper on the leavings of a body of Fellows without duties. If these older and richer foundations seem only just to have held their own against more modern and less richly endowed rivals, it is fair to remember how their resources were absorbed, and what sorry examples were set before them.

Mr. Thornton writes pompously on the early history of Harrow. To the defects of his style let this specimen testify. A certain Dr. Snape

"took part in what is known as the Bangorian controversy, wherein the right of the clergy to transfer allegiance from their legitimate rulers to those who reigned by national choice, rather than hereditary position, was, if nominally on grounds purely ecclesiastical, practically challenged by Hoadly, Bishop of Bangor."

If only the Master of Trinity had corrected the style of this paper, as well as supplemented it by his interesting sketch of recent Harrow!

In the case of four schools — Eton, Harrow, Cheltenham, and Rugby—special chapters on athletics have been contributed, by the Rev. S. James, Mr. P. H. Martineau, Mr. E. Skirving, and Mr. Lees Knowles, M.P., respectively; they are pleasant and genial records, but monotonous in their character. Mr. Knowles, perhaps, hits off the style suitable to such things best; the story with which he concludes, of the interview between his head master and a certain H——, is amusingly laconic: "H——, I think. H——, you run; so did I. You hold the school-bags, H——; so did I. You don't work, H——; I did. You must. Good morning." Mr. Lee Warner writes a pleasant paper on the last fifty years of Rugby; but to describe a certain period of the school as one in which "by its very successes it had somewhat spent its strength" is an unwise euphemism. All schools have had such periods; but they will do well to think of them, and speak of them by the right name. Mr. L. Huxley describes Charterhouse and its historic removal to the Surrey hills, its life and its admirable library, very agreeably and without prolixity.

Educationally speaking, the most interesting feature of the volume is the testimony it bears to the modern or Victorian public schools. The chapters on Cheltenham, Clifton, Haileybury, and Marlborough —why has Wellington no place here?— will remind people of a most remarkable development. None of these schools is sixty years old, yet they are already level in the race—to say no more—with the older foundations in many essential respects. The fact is that neither a wealthy foundation nor even an historic background can be regarded as an unmixed advantage to institutions which are naturally tempted to indolence and pride. Even of these papers, written for the most part in a sensible though enthusiastic tone, a foreign Matthew Arnold would be tempted to say, We see your public schools, but are they always at play? We see beautiful pictures of their buildings—have you nothing to tell us of their aspirations and ideas?

Venerabilis Baedae Historiam Ecclesiasticam Gentis Anglorum, Historiam Abbatum, Epistolam ad Ecgbertum, una cum Historia Abbatum Auctore Anonymo ad fidem Codicum Manuscriptorum denuo recognovit, Commentario tam critico quam historico instruxit Carolus Plummer, A.M. 2 vols. (Oxford, Clarendon Press.)

In the interval between publishing the text of the Anglo-Saxon Chronicle and preparing a full commentary upon it, Mr. Plummer has applied himself to the historical works of Bede, deeming, not without reason, that a critical edition of them forms an indispensable preliminary to a proper investigation of the sources of the earlier portions of the Chronicle. Such an edition he has now produced, and for it he deserves the hearty gratitude of all students of the origines of English history. To say, as he says, that it is the first critical edition since Smith published his in 1722 is to understate its merits. Mr. Plummer has examined no fewer than forty-five manuscripts, while Smith contented himself with four. He has found that these forty-five arrange themselves in three classes, according as they follow the pattern of the Moore MS. at Cambridge (Kk. v. 16) or that of the Cottonian MS. Tiberius C. ii., or contain a conflate text. The result of this examination is to prove, as the late Father Stevenson had independently discovered, that the first class, headed by M, offers the text of a first edition of the 'Historia Ecclesiastica,' finished in 731, while the second class, that of C, represents a second edition completed in 734. Mr. Plummer has furnished a full and careful description of the manuscripts he has inspected, and our only complaint about this part of his work is that he has thought it desirable to indicate them in most cases by a single initial, denoting the place or the collection in which they are now preserved, and to distinguish different manuscripts in the same place or collection by inferior numerals. Now inferior numerals are not only difficult to read and to remember, but are extremely liable to be misprinted. Nor was it at all necessary thus to reduce the symbols to their smallest dimensions, since Mr. Plummer has collated only the four leading manuscripts. It is confusing to have twenty-one Oxford manuscripts all denoted by O (O_1, O_2, &c.), when most of them might have been more clearly represented by abbreviations like "Hatt.," "Dou.," "Fairf." (for the Hatton, Douce, and Fairfax MSS.), and "Ball.," "Linc.," "Mert.," &c. (for the various college MSS.).

Since, however, Mr. Plummer has done so much, it is, perhaps, hypercritical to object to small details; nor do we at all think he has erred in collating throughout only a small number of manuscripts. Modern editors are too apt to suppose that a complete collation of everything obtainable is absolutely essential to the production of a critical text; whereas a trained scholar who has four manuscripts before him of the very century in which his author wrote is perfectly able after scrupulous examination to relegate all the remainder to the category of transcripts taken directly or indirectly from these four. We may illustrate this fact by some remarks concerning one manuscript which stands probably next in date to the four here collated, but which Mr. Plummer has not inspected, though by means of a catalogue he has been enabled to judge its general affinity correctly (see his introduction, p. xcix, n. 3). We refer to the Berne MS. 49, a volume written in the ninth century, and formerly belonging to the famous monastery of Fleury. Mr. Plummer sets out five leading tests whereby to distinguish the earlier (M) edition from the later (C). In all these the Berne MS. agrees with M. Now the Harleian MS. 4978 is believed by Mr. Plummer to be "unquestionably a direct transcript from M." It contains at the end of the 'Historia Ecclesiastica' pieces from Isidore and Gregory II., and it was, in Mr. Plummer's opinion, the scribe of the Harleian manuscript (H_1) who inserted the same extracts at the end of M. They are also found, in the same position, in the Berne MS. "The most decisive evidence of copying," says Mr. Plummer, "is given by those instances in which the scribe of H_1 has misinterpreted the reading of M." He gives two specimens, in which exactly the same mistakes appear in the Berne MS. All three manuscripts agree in abbreviating quotations from the Bible, and they abbreviate in the same manner. The two younger manuscripts, moreover, agree in incorporating in the text additions which M has in the margin (e.g., lib. ii. 10, p. 102, n. 4). Mr. Plummer cites also nine cases in which the clerical blunders of M are repeated in H_1. In every one of these the Berne MS. originally presented the same reading; only in three of them the error has since been found out and corrected. There are other readings which seem to show that the Berne MS. stands midway between M and H_1—in other words, that H_1 was actually transcribed from it. How else are we to account for the fact that both Berne and H_1 have written in lib. iii. 11 (p. 149, n. 6) "ille" instead of illo, and that both have corrected the word into illa, except on the supposition that the scribe of H_1 was copying the text of Berne, and did not notice the correction until he had written the blundered word? Again, in the same page, "the scribe of M at first wrote sanitati" for sanati (n. 9); so did the Berne scribe, but he erased the letters it, and the mistake does not appear elsewhere. In lib. ii. 17 (p. 120, n. 1) M has "spatia" instead of spatiis; Berne likewise has "spatia," which has been corrected into spatiis by a later hand; and H_1 has spatiis over an erasure. In lib. v. 8 (p. 295, n. 2) Berne alone follows M in the reading "sacerdos," but it has the last three letters erased. Two other instances may be added which cannot be verified in Mr. Plummer's edition, since he does not profess to have collated H_1 throughout. First, in lib. iv. 13 the Berne MS. by an accidental confusion reads "coiberi haec que post Cantuarius ad auster" instead of "cohiberi; siquidem divertens ad provinciam Australium Saxonum, quae post Cantuarios ad aus-trum." H_1 has tried to make sense of the Berne words by writing "cohiberi sic que post cantuarios ad auster." Secondly, in lib. ii. 18 Berne and H_1 alone, so far as we know, make a new chapter begin with the letter of Honorius, "Dilectissimo fratri."

One single reading that we have noticed may seem opposed to our hypothesis, which is that H_1, which comes undoubtedly from a French monastery, is a direct transcript, not of M, but of the Fleury book now preserved at Berne. In lib. iii. 20 M has "menses uii" corrected into "iiii," and Berne has "ui," while H_1, according to Mr. Plummer, has "septem" written in full. But no data are so insecure for establishing the relations of manuscripts as those offered by numerals. It is a curious illustration of the difficulty presented even by the simplest figures that not only Mr. Plummer but also Profs. Mayor and Lumby comment on the passage to which we have referred on the assumption that Bede says "seven" when the text they print says "four."

The facts that have been brought out may serve to show that there is still something left for gleaners after Mr. Plummer; and yet all that we have elicited affects nothing of the real words of Bede, but merely the precise relation of one derivative of M to another. It may not be out of place to add that the other Berne MS. (No. 363) cited as one of the 'Historia Ecclesiastica' cannot claim that character. Six leaves of that volume (ff. 188b to 194a) contain a mere epitome of part of lib. i., and end abruptly at the words "in membris meis" in the middle of ch. xxvii. (p. 61, l. 5 from foot, in Mr. Plummer's edition). The only point of interest about the fragment is that it was written in the eighth century, and shows how quickly Bede's history won its way as a text-book which might be summarized for educational purposes.

In printing his text Mr. Plummer has introduced the convenient innovation (familiar from an analogous practice in the 'Monumenta Germaniae' and in the Rolls Series) of using italic type "to indicate those parts of Bede's work which are derived from previously existing materials, so far as these have come down to us." It was unlucky, however, that he was not made aware of one important and highly interesting source until it was too late to embody its results except in the form of addenda to vol. i. and of an appendix to vol. ii. We refer to the oldest life of Gregory the Great, written by a monk of Whitby, which was published by Paul Ewald from a St. Gall manuscript in 1886, and from which Bede obtained a great part of his information about the Pope. It is here, for instance, that we find for the first time the famous story of Gregory and the English boys at Rome:—

"Cumque responderent, Anguli dicuntur illi, de quibus sumus, ille dixit Angeli Dei. Deinde dixit, Rex gentis illius quomodo nominatur? Et dixerunt Aelli. Et ille ait, Alleluia! laus enim Dei esse debet illic. Tribus quoque illius nomen de qua erant proprie requisivit. Et dixerunt Deire. Et ille dixit, De ira Dei confugientes ad fidem."

What is strange is that Mr. Plummer has not yet discovered that the relevant portions of Ewald's publication were all printed by Sir John Seeley in the English Historical Review for 1888 (vol. iii. 305–310).

The text of Bede is provided with marginal headings of contents, and so are—which is a very convenient innovation—the notes in the second volume. Perhaps the editor adopted the idea from Profs. Mayor and Lumby, who, however, made use of the less practical method of indicating the leading point in a number of notes on a given page by means of the headline. From their edition of books iii. and iv. Mr. Plummer has naturally derived great assistance; but there is no sign of servile copying, and he has wisely abstained from repeating a large part of the endless references, many of which are only remotely connected with the subject in hand. Still, it is only fair to add that the commentary of the Cambridge scholars, with its helpful prefatory notices to each chapter, is by no means superseded by the briefer and more business-like exposition which we owe to Oxford. Nor is Mr. Plummer himself exempt from the tendency to digression and unnecessary illustration. It is impossible not to regret that the notes are put in a separate volume, as though Bede were a class-book for schools. Had the work appeared in demy octavo, there would have been plenty of room for the notes at the foot of the page in a single volume, and the editor would have been compelled to exercise more self-repression; he would, moreover, have saved himself the labour of compiling a distinct index for each volume, where both from the nature of the case to a great extent repeat one another.

It is impossible here to linger over the innumerable points of interest that arise out of the commentary. We must content ourselves with a couple of examples. Since Loofs wrote his remarkable dissertation on the ancient British and Scottish churches, scholars have been gradually coming to acquiesce in the view that St. Patrick is in reality the Palladius of Bede, i. 13. But Mr. Plummer, unless we are mistaken, has the credit of discovering the origin of the name Patricius, which first appears in Tirechan. "It is quite possible"—so the editor modestly puts forward a brilliant hypothesis—

"that the statement of Tirechan, 'Paladius..... qui Patricius alio nomine appelabatur,' may ultimately rest on some confused reminiscence of the present chapter of Bede, and that the words 'qui et patricius fuit,' which belong to Aetius, have got attached to Palladius, and this may be the starting-point of later developments. Saints have been created out of less. We have seen the origin of St. Amphibalus from St. Alban's cloak (c. 7); and a St. Pontiolus has been evolved from a false reading of ποντιόλῳ for ποτιόλων (=Puteoli) in the Antiochene Acts of St. Ignatius."

A quotation from the chapter of Bede in question will enable the reader to judge the character of this conjecture:—

"Cuius anno imperii VIII. Palladius ad Scottos in Christum credentes a pontifice Romanae ecclesiae Celestino primus mittitur episcopus. Anno autem regni eius XXIII., Aetius vir inlustris, qui et patricius fuit, tertium cum Simmacho gessit consulatum."

To those who are acquainted with the style of writing of the age and with the perverse practices of transcribers the suggestion will, we think, appear to possess a high degree of probability. But it does not involve, as Mr. Plummer seems to say, a doubt as to "the very existence of St. Patrick." It only denies the existence of a Patrick, the "Patricius secundus" of Tirechan, distinct from Palladius.

Mr. Plummer has some valuable remarks on the question whether the Upper Thames valley belonged to Wessex or Mercia. Mr. James Parker in his 'Early History of Oxford' maintained that when the West-Saxon king Cwichelm made a treaty with Penda of Mercia in 628 "there is not much doubt that the Thames was the stipulated southern boundary of Mercia," so that Birinus, the first bishop of the West Saxons, established his see on Mercian territory. It does not need much knowledge of our early ecclesiastical system to perceive that such an hypothesis is incredible. But when was the strip of land north of the Thames lost by Wessex? The usual opinion is that this did not happen until the battle of Bensington in 777. On the other hand, it is certain that Wulfhere invaded Wessex in 661, and a Bishop Aetla is found at Dorchester in Oxfordshire not long afterwards, at a date when the West-Saxon see is known to have been placed at Winchester. Consequently this Aetla is usually regarded as the same person as Haedde of Winchester. Mr. Plummer, however, unwilling to charge Bede with this confusion of names, suggests (on book iv. 23) that Ethelred of Mercia "may well have continued Wulfhere's policy of curtailing Wessex . . . and gained possession of Dorchester" not long after his accession in 675; so that Aetla's establishment as bishop was a direct sequel to this (supposed) victory. Mr. Plummer thinks it probable that Caedwalla of Wessex, after he came to the throne in 686, "recovered this and other districts belonging to Wessex," and "that consequently the Mercian bishopric of Dorchester disappeared after a very few years of existence." The theory certainly deserves consideration; it has the advantage of removing all the difficulties in our data, but it has also the disadvantage of postulating an unrecorded conquest and reconquest.

The book is exceedingly well and accurately printed, and the errata we have observed are hardly worth drawing attention to. It may, however, be noted that in the introduction (p. clv, n. 1, 2) Lupus of Ferrières is twice called Lupus of Ferrara; and readers will be surprised to find the famous Codex Laudianus of the Acts and Epistles obscurely referred to (p. liv) as "a MS. now existing in the Bodleian Library," with a foot-note, "Laud. Greek, No. 35." The introduction as a whole is an important contribution both to the life of Bede and to the criticism of his writings.

NEW NOVELS.

A Marriage Mystery. By Fergus Hume. (Digby, Long & Co.)

Tracked by a Tattoo. By the same author. (Warne & Co.)

Mr. Fergus Hume has undoubtedly been endowed with a talent for stories of crime, and he shows wisdom in devoting himself to this class of fiction. It must be enough to say, without revealing the bold solution of it, that 'A Marriage Mystery' is ingeniously put together. The mystery is of course a murder. In the working out of the plot the author cleverly tries to make the reader fix the crime first upon one character and then upon another, but there is one detail which seems weak. Much depends on the exact time at which the murder was committed. This is supposed to be made certain by a doctor's opinion. A doctor would hardly pretend to be certain from the appearance of a corpse that death took place at a moment which could be made precise within half an hour, and even if he were prepared to come to such a decision, a court of justice would certainly not accept his opinion as conclusive. A thoroughly good detective story should not leave ragged ends like this. There is, however, another point in which Mr. Hume is not quite successful. To make a satisfactory novel of this kind it is necessary to rouse strong interest in some direction. One wants the characters, or some of them, to be fascinating or at least strikingly lifelike, but Mr. Hume does not succeed in enlisting the reader's sympathy for any character. He makes one say, "I certainly should like to know, but really I don't much care which of them did it."

Madaline Garry substituted her own child for the legitimate son of Sir Francis Fellenger. But that baronet before his death had had the rightful heir tattooed with a cross on the left arm, and wrote an account of the transaction and his suspicions of Madaline's designs. To make things all right, he naturally concealed the document in a secret drawer in a cabinet, where it was a million to one against its ever being discovered. On this common-sense foundation Mr. Hume has built yet another detective story. The murder in Tooley's Alley is sufficiently mysterious, and it must be admitted that the multiplicity of the characters, and the reasons which involve almost all of them, one after the other, in suspicion of a guilty connexion with the crime, are most plausibly and artfully adduced. Not until the fall of the curtain does the reader discover that a doubt he had of the young solicitor, principally on the ground that there is no sufficient reason for his introduction otherwise, is justified by the event. Mr. Hume's new book is good of its kind, but we wish even Mr. Fauks would talk a little better. "I'm agreeable" may do for him in his professional capacity, but Rixton is supposed to speak like a gentleman.

Half round the World for a Husband. By May Crommelin. (Fisher Unwin.)

Like Bessie Bell and Mary Gray, Ann and Anita were two bonny lasses. They were also much alike; and when Anita was to leave her English school and return to Chili to be married to a man she had never seen, it occurred to her as a happy thought to send her bosom friend instead, first to the betrothal by proxy and then upon the voyage. How this meritorious scheme succeeds is the topic of the story, which consists principally of descriptions of West Indian and South American life and scenery—descriptions which we are bound to say are graphic and interesting. If the absurdity of the plot can be condoned, we may add that Ann Montague is a very nice girl, and deserves the fortunate result of her travels and troubles. Also the vulgar Lothario of her outward voyage seems likely to be appropriately punished by the stout lady of colour who "owns him."

The Sign of the Spider. By Bertram Mitford. (Methuen & Co.)

This is a story of South African adventure of a very blood-curdling order. It matters little that the character who occupies the position of hero is a rather blackguardly class of man. Adventures are, of course, to the adventurous, and among the adventurous there is a fair proportion of such heroes. Nor is it an outrage to probability that our hero, though a married man, should make love with more or less success to girls civilized and uncivilized, nor that he should in the end come to wealth and happiness. But in the most terrible of his adventures the power of shuddering horror demanded of the reader is a little overtaxed. This is when a savage tribe puts the hero into a pit with a cavern conveniently attached, where dwells a nasty creature, nasty and awful beyond all things—a spider larger than life, as big in fact as a bear and as shaggy, with "the head of a devil, the body and legs of a spider," flail-like tentacle or tentacles, and nippers. One readily agrees with the author when he says, rather tamely, "No, it was no ordinary thing this fearsome monster." The hero is of course saved, partly by his own vigour and power of will, and partly by the help of a lady, a sort of dusky princess, with "shapely shoulders which glistened light bronze in the moonlight." Still, with all its absurdities of detail and of style, Mr. Mitford's story is in its way exciting.

Tomalyn's Quest. By G. B. Burgin. (Innes & Co.)

Mr. Burgin's sprightly and vivacious style would make almost any story readable. The present one is sufficiently exciting in itself to meet the most exacting demands; indeed, something less reminiscent of the fairy stories of one's youth would have preserved the dénoûment from a strong suspicion of extravagance. Tomalyn Crane is a manly and altogether delightful youth who goes out to Turkey in search of adventures as the private secretary of Tomkins Pasha. His desires are amply fulfilled, and his loves, his daring exploits, and perpetual hairbreadth escapes from Russian and Armenian intrigues are all related in the breeziest fashion, with plentiful touches of genial humour, and provide the pleasantest pastime for a couple of leisure hours. So real and vivid is the character-drawing of the principal personages, and so skilfully are the episodes introduced, that it is quite a disagreeable shock to find so childish a device resorted to for the dénoûment as the species of conjuring trick which transforms an admirable but plain girl into a beauty at the expense of her wicked but lovely rival, in order that Tomalyn may live happily ever afterwards. Even this lapse into extravagance, however, cannot materially injure a tale so witty, wholesome, and well written.

The Squire of Wandales. By A. Shield. (Methuen & Co.)

Our old friend Bluebeard in the dress of a modern young man is a truly astounding apparition. Mr. Ninian Scrope, however, plays the part with great spirit—so much so that the nursery hero's matrimonial exploits grow pale and insignificant when compared with those of his successor. The reader who can keep count of his wives and victims must have a strong head and an appetite for forcible-feeble sensationalism beyond the ordinary capacity. Personally we prefer the original Bluebeard; he was a great deal more amusing than the Squire of Wandales, and there was not so much of him.

The Story of Bell. By L. Beith Dalziel. (Ward & Downey.)

Little is exacted of the average domestic story, except that it should supply plenty of sentimental romance of the sound, wholesome, and legitimate order. 'The Story of Bell,' while full of the necessary exuberant sentimentality and highflown aspirations, has egregiously strayed from its proper track in the matter of plot. A mild touch of fin-de-siècle freedom is nauseously out of place in this order of novel, which is certainly little if it is not strictly wholesome. That the heroine should continue to cherish an unlawful attachment for her cousin's husband after his marriage, and that her sentiments should be reciprocated, is sad indeed. Moreover, there is absolutely a mutual confession of the same, and heroics run wild over a situation which a young girl might consider doubtful reading for her mother. Of course little harm is done, beyond an inevitable death, or rather suicide; but strong matters need strong handling, and Bell—for all the adjectives lavished upon her—has not received it.

The Evolution of a Wife. By Elizabeth Holland. (Milne.)

This "romance in six parts" appears to be the first novel published by its author. She would have been better advised to have reduced it to one-third of its present length, when it might have had some chance of success. As it is, the book presents itself as a lengthy task. It requires resolution and much perseverance to follow the fortunes of the heroine throughout nearly four hundred large and closely printed pages of diffuse and wandering narration, interspersed with an unconscionable proportion of English-French schoolroom jargon. "Madame a l'air si fatigué," observes the heroine's maid, to which her mistress replies, "Et tu aussi." It is to be hoped the Grey Sisters who kept the convent school at Altenbourg were not responsible for their ex-pupils' conversational exploits. The English in which the book is written is decidedly slipshod, and the whole is ill arranged and involved. Some of the domestic scenes in the old Swiss town are pretty and lifelike; the same can scarcely be said for the feudal lair of the Austrian counts and the heroine's experiences there.

Merlin: a Piratical Love Study. By Mr. M——. (Beeman.)

For lovers of adventure who are not particular as to the form in which it is conveyed to them, 'Merlin' will provide an entrancing hour. There is a variety and ingenuity in the experiences which befall Mr. Smith and a lady, during their flight in a canoe across the ocean, well calculated to take the reader's breath away. As for the "love study," that side of the story resembles rather the ravings of delirium than any connected romance. This is no doubt intentional, since Merlin, alias Mr. Smith, whether millionaire, pauper, pirate, adventurer, or mechanical genius (and it is difficult to classify him), is certainly mad. And his madness would be permissible, even interesting, were his frenzies expressed in better and less inflated English. In this particular the narrator and heroine of the tale is, unfortunately, his equal. Indeed, her vanity and egotism go far to spoil the effect at some of the most thrilling points in their adventures, when the action is arrested to make way for her own unlikely emotions. Mr. M—— has undoubtedly a vivid imagination and an intimate knowledge of those enchanted Southern seas; besides which he is an authority upon ships. Had he confined himself to these matters, and omitted the melodrama on land, his book would have had greater merits.

JOHNSONIANA.

Johnson's Lives of the Poets. A New Edition, with Notes and Introduction by Arthur Waugh. Vols. III.–VI. (Kegan Paul & Co.)—When this edition originally made its appearance, we reviewed its first and second volumes at length. All we have now to do is to announce its completion. The sixth and last volume has a "note on the portraits," which was much needed, and an excellent index. Mr. Waugh seems to have adopted one of our suggestions, in so far as he has moderated the zeal of his notes without curtailing their usefulness. To certain of the obscurer authors his annotations supply matter of positive bibliographical novelty. The extremely rare 1714 edition of Oldisworth's 'Life of Edmund Smith' has probably never before been collated with Johnson's account, and the notes to Congreve are luminous. In writing of Prior and Gay, Mr. Waugh adopts the latest discoveries of Mr. Austin Dobson and others. We notice a bad misprint in the sixth of Pope's Epitaphs. This edition is, however, a highly creditable performance, and it is not too much to say that it presents the most useful as well as the most agreeable form in which Johnson's 'Lives of the Poets' now lies upon the market.

Boswell's Life of Johnson. Edited by Augustine Birrell. 6 vols. (Constable & Co.)—This also is a pretty book, light to handle, clear to read, bound in scarlet and gold, with an unusually happy design upon the back. But from the editorial point of view there is little to be said for it. Mr. Birrell's idea of editing a book is to write a short entertaining essay and let the text take care of itself. It is to be feared that this agreeable essayist is too deeply occupied with his other numerous avocations to bestow much thought on his literary undertakings. If he had had time to read his proofs, would he have opened his essay by the cryptic remark that "Carlyle observed in that manner of his which has now become part of our incorporate existence"? There are too many instances of similar carelessness in writing. We know not what there is in Mr. Birrell's lazy, happy-go-lucky attitude to literature which annoys us. He confesses that he has no appetite for any serious form of study or research, and yet he pushes in to do the very work which requires the labour of the scholar. He should go on writing his pleasant little essays, and leave the English classics alone. His notes are extremely few, and add little or nothing to the usefulness of the text. But although Mr. Birrell might have been better occupied elsewhere, his publishers have produced a really pretty and handy edition of Boswell's 'Life.'

SCOTTISH LITERATURE.

Opinions will vary as to the taste of a work like Margaret Ogilvy, by Mr. J. M. Barrie (Hodder & Stoughton), which deals without scruple with relations so intimate and tender as those between a mother and her son; but there is no doubt that, if so delicate a task should ever be publicly undertaken, Mr. Barrie's treatment of it is marked by that appreciation of wise simplicity and that sympathetic grasp of domestic details which have distinguished the series of books he has devoted to the setting forth of the humours and virtues of his humbler countrymen. This book has much of the charm of its predecessors, and has the added virtue of being entirely and obviously a sincere study from the life. The motives which have urged him to a task at first sight so inconsistent with the reticence in matters of feeling which is at least as salient a characteristic of his countrymen as their essential tenderness appear to be various: first, a praiseworthy zeal for the due recording of a character which seems singular in its combination of shrewdness, mirthfulness, and piety; next, the acknowledgment of a debt to one who was at once his stimulus and his model; thirdly, perhaps, a desire for the commemoration of a distinctively Scottish virtue, which to some extent is suffering eclipse from the modern tendency to publicity and gregariousness in the life of the craftsman:—

"With so many of the family, young mothers among them, working in the factories, home life is not so beautiful as it was. So much of what is great in Scotland has sprung from the closeness of the family ties; it is there I sometimes fear my country is being struck."

Certainly this memoir of the gentle peasant woman Margaret Ogilvy (Mr. Barrie sticks to the old Scots style in retaining his mother's maiden name), whose counterfeit presentment looks demurely at us from the frontispiece, from the days when the little girl of six in a pinafore carried her mason father his dinner in a "flagon" to those last ones when, with the old christening robe in view, she passed away in the ripeness of old age, is eloquent of family love and filial devotion and respect. Even a more interesting figure is that of the pious daughter who predeceased by only three days the mother to whom she had consecrated her life and strength. To his mother it is clear Mr. Barrie owed not only inspiration, but information and correction in producing the marvellous miniatures of cottage life which have made his genius known. Her aspirations and fears for him, her dread of the seductions of town life, her fierce maternal jealousy of the greater fame of Stevenson (whose works she averred were worthless until she was detected reading them in secret), her conviction that "those weary books" were undermining her son's health, and her alternations of intense pride in his achievements, make up a very pleasant picture of devoted motherhood. Yet it is notable that her influence in a literary sense was not that of hereditary culture—it was her tenacious memory, her intuition of character, that rendered her more inspiring than many an instructed authority. Without these gifts her faculty of rapid reading (though "with ten minutes to spare before the starch was ready she would begin the 'Decline and Fall'—and finish it, too, that winter") would have little availed the future novelist. Incidental scenes of family life give scope at times to humour of the usual flavour. When our author is entrusted, like the henpecked "goodman" in the old song, with the housework of the day, and distinguishes himself by polishing the kitchen grate with one of the new table-napkins, the duologue between mother and sister is characteristic:—

"'Woe's me! that is what comes of his not letting me budge from this room. O, it is a watery Sabbath when men take to doing women's work!' 'It defies the face of day, mother, to fathom what makes him so senseless.' 'Oh, it's that weary writing.'"

These domestic critics, however, were proud of their hero, and soon became more appreciative than the "devout lady" who, when asked how she was getting on with one of Mr. Barrie's books, replied:—

"Sal, it's dreary, weary, uphill work, but I've wrastled through with tougher jobs in my time, and, please God, I'll wrastle through with this one."

Into the more sacred penetralia of this remarkable piece of family history we forbear to follow the biographer.

The Romance of a King's Life, by J. J. Jusserand, translated from the French by M. R., revised and enlarged by the author (Fisher Unwin), has a fitting frontispiece in Pinturicchio's picture of Æneas Sylvius before King James I. The background, meant to represent Scotland, is far too beautiful for that country as seen by telescope from Paris—a desperate land of boundless moor, songless except for the cawing of crows, with its houses built of irregular stone without mortar and roofed with heather, a land, indeed, where heather is the great friend, without which human life would cease. Besides heather, there was but one friend, "one single ally, distant France." M. Jusserand himself is the pleasantest of proofs that distant France has not yet ceased to furnish allies to a Stuart king. It was kind of him to relieve his sombre Scottish landscape with a quotation from Bartholomew Anglicus, who was complimentary enough to think that the people were extremely handsome in body and visage, though they did wear a garb that did not set them off to advantage. There is, notwithstanding, some geographical injustice in shifting the Highland border-line about fifty miles too far north and deporting the Wall of Antonine bodily into North England. The substance of this sketch of the energetic career of King James is a paraphrase of the 'Kingis Quair' combined with an account of the mission of Regnault Girard to Scotland in 1435–1436 for the purpose of taking back to France the Princess Margaret, who was to become Dauphiness. The sober student who has read the admirable article which M. Jusserand contributed some time ago to the Nineteenth Century will greatly regret that he did not transcribe much more of the text of the Parisian MS. on Girard's mission for the present booklet, which, though bright and eloquent, is somewhat lacking in substance. Half idyl, half tragedy, James's life was too eventful to compass within a hundred very small pages and not be inadequate in every aspect. The protracted correspondence in our columns last summer naturally left some expectancy when it closed with the announcement that the forthcoming translation of 'Le Roman d'un Roi d'Écosse' would contain a definite deliverance on the vexed question of King James as author. It is therefore not without surprise that we read in the appendix a mere reference to that correspondence, repeating the author's view that Mr. J. T. T. Brown's negative thesis, though very cleverly maintained, is untenable. Differences between French and English, however, show a frank recognition that some things have happened since 1895. Alterations in detail are made full of quiet significance. The French book contained many allusions to Windsor, which in 1895 was the accepted scene of the romance of James. In English these disappear: for "le poète de Windsor" the translation has "the poet of the 'Kingis Quair.'" The revised list of James's prisons also illustrates the change. His capture the French original assigned to April 12th, 1405; so does the English version; but the French stated that previously Hotspur's son had been a playfellow of the prince at St. Andrews. This the translator drops, no doubt because of the awkward bearing of the known fact that Percy arrived in Scotland in June, 1405. As regards the year of capture M. Jusserand appears to be making a futile though gallant stand against the best chronological authority. Exception must assuredly be taken also to his ranking John Major as the best informed of the old historians of Scotland. Certainly his being a first-rate witness against Mr. Brown is enough to merit the tribute of M. Jusserand's admiration, but with the dispassionate critic that will scarcely be enough. Considered in its application to him as historian, Buchanan's cruel epigram—solo cognomine Major—was not so very far from the truth about his former master, who, he said too sweepingly, had not a sound page in a whole book. The question whether or not there was peace at the time of James's capture is in a measure involved in the dispute about the date. There might, if not with material profit, at any rate without irrelevance, have been cited the odd French tale that King Henry IV., in spite of a special safe-conduct granted, detained the prince after his father King Robert's death, on the ground that the safe-conduct was in the name not of the King of Scotland, but of the King of Scotland's son! This subterfuge of state, though not historic, was worthy enough of the crafty Bolingbroke. A line might have been spared to show that King James's daughter narrowly escaped in 1436 a repetition of her father's experience of capture by English ships. They lay in wait in the Channel to intercept her convoy off the "Rase de la Bretaign" (the "raiss" of Brittany named in Barbour's 'Bruce'), but the princess, defying for once the ill luck of her house, completed her voyage. In the poetical-prose rendering of the 'Kingis Quair' is plainly to be found the reason why the author elected not to discuss at length within the same covers the problem of authorship. Rhetorical periods, graceful in themselves, can ill brook to be punctuated with the deadly comment of a doubt. Probably it was wiser to leave the reader to wrestle with it for himself with such valuable antecedent aids as our own columns have furnished, and in the hope that some day soon a decisive grammarian may arrive.

OUR LIBRARY TABLE.

The lives of eccentric noblemen have for some time been a favourite subject with Mr. J. R. Robinson, who must have found the task of writing on Philip, Duke of Wharton, 1698–1731 (Sampson Low & Co.), congenial. No biography of this strange individual has appeared since the brief memoir published shortly after his death. There is, in fact, nothing of much importance to be told of this brief record of folly and vice. Owing to the services of his father, Thomas, Marquis of Wharton, the reputed author of 'Lillibullero,' the future duke's career began under favourable auspices. The highest rank in the peerage was conferred on him while still under age, and before he had been able to render any services deserving such an honour. He was said, however, to be an orator, and this reputation is to some extent confirmed by the published version of his speech in the House of Lords during the debate on Atterbury's attainder. With the prestige of his rank, and with the advantages which he possessed for public life, Wharton might have been highly distinguished in parliamentary life; but the career of an English statesman was not suited to his reckless character. He soon plunged into a life of profligacy, became President of the Hell Fire Club, and in his more serious moments wrote bitter attacks in Mist's Journal on the king and Walpole. This, however, did not satisfy his craving for notoriety, and after running through the greater part of his fortune, he went to the Continent to offer his services to the Pretender. To show that he was really in earnest, he joined the Spanish army as a volunteer, and served against his own countrymen at the siege of Gibraltar. Notwithstanding this outrageous conduct, he was treated with great lenity by the English Government, and it was intimated to him that if he sued for the royal clemency, he might still hope for forgiveness. Nothing, however, could persuade him to abandon his mad projects, which constantly involved him in debts and difficulties. It was at one time even reported that he was obliged to earn his livelihood by keeping a school at Rouen, where his friend Mist was supporting himself by driving a hackney coach. Ill health was before long added to Wharton's other troubles, and on May 31st, 1731, he died in his thirty-third year, without a friend by his side, at a Benedictine monastery in Catalonia. Mr. Robinson has shown conspicuous industry in searching for information for his work, but it must have been rather a hopeless task. The one romantic episode in Wharton's life was his marriage at Madrid. He had fallen in love with a maid of honour at the Spanish Court, but for some time he could not obtain permission to make her his wife, and he showed such deep sorrow at his disappointment that the queen at last relented and gave her consent to the marriage. It was not, however, a happy one, and Wharton, after neglecting his wife for a few years, left her a widow in the most abject poverty. Mr. Robinson writes that after Wharton's death the duchess came to London, "for what purpose it is difficult to say." Her object was, of course, to obtain a portion of her husband's property. Apparently she was not successful, and if the newspapers of that day are to be trusted, the estate forfeited by the duke's attainder was restored by the king to his two sisters. Mr. Robinson has managed to produce a fairly readable volume, and in his own peculiar style he has enlivened it with many allusions to Wharton's distinguished contemporaries.

Mr. Craik has brought his English Prose Selections (Macmillan) to a close with a fifth volume of extracts from writers of the present century. The selections are very well chosen, and include writers so recently dead as Stevenson and Pater. The introductions to the authors are luminous, considering their brevity, and many of them (such as Mr. Beeching's on Newman and Prof. Raleigh's on Stevenson) distinctly felicitous. It is surprising to read that Dickens has "left behind him no special congregation of admirers," and Froude (in spite of Mr. Dodds) is certainly "a master of style" in the best sense. A proper sense of proportion in such a book is difficult to realize, but Beaconsfield ought certainly not to have more space allotted to him than Thackeray and Lamb, and twice as much as Froude and Stevenson! The admirable if unequal Hazlitt deserves to furnish more select English prose than the stilted Milman or Harriet Martineau.

The Nugæ Litterariæ of Mr. William Mathews (Sampson Low & Co.) are exceedingly well intentioned, but essentially commonplace. A writer who talks of "Rome's charming lyrist, Horace," was evidently well fitted to be "librarian of the Young Men's Library Association in Chicago, some thirty years ago," but he need not have printed a volume of nearly 350 pages on 'The Credulity of Scepticism,' 'The Pleasures of the Table,' 'Revivals of Religion,' and other novel topics.

Messrs. Putnam's Sons publish a handsome volume by Dr. Keasbey, The Nicaragua Canal and the Monroe Doctrine, which is really a history of the Clayton-Bulwer Treaty and an American view of its present position. The surrender to the United States with regard to Venezuela is a sign that we are now far from the days when Liberal and Conservative Governments alike—Lord Granville, Mr. Gladstone, and Sir William Harcourt as strongly as Lord Salisbury—repudiated the intervention of the States in the affairs of Central and South America. The author of the work before us elaborately defends the somewhat Punic position that the Clayton-Bulwer Treaty should be let alone by the United States for the present, with the certainty that when the time comes for action on the completion of the canal it can be denounced with impunity; and his conclusion is that "the United States, by constructing the Nicaragua Canal, and by establishing their prestige along the course of the westerly route, may, despite the present integrity of the Clayton-Bulwer Treaty, well hope to force the ultimate recognition of their Monroe doctrine and control the western gateway to the Pacific."

There is no sufficient ground for the appearance of Alexis de Tocqueville et la Démocratie Libérale, a study from the pen of M. Eugène d'Eichthal, published by M. Calmann Lévy. The book is partly made up out of works of Tocqueville which are easily accessible to the reader, and mainly out of the conversations with Nassau Senior. The manner in which the extracts are strung together, and the notes, are both of them fair and intelligent; but the whole volume does not add to our knowledge of Tocqueville, and there is no original matter in it except a few extracts from a not particularly important series of letters which has not yet seen the light, and which the author has, apparently, not been allowed to use except to a very limited extent.

Under the title of L'Enfermé, M. Gustave Geoffroy has written a volume, published by the Bibliothèque Charpentier, which forms a life of the well-known revolutionist Blanqui.

Jack is the last addition to Mrs. (?) Ensor's translations of Daudet's novels published by Messrs. J. M. Dent & Co. This edition, which fills two volumes, has Myrbach's illustrations.

A second edition has appeared of Ferdinand Lotheissen's excellent Geschichte der französischen Litteratur im XVII. Jahrhundert (Vienna, Gerold's Sohn), a work well known as a most conscientious and trustworthy handbook to the Augustan age of French literature. A brief biography accompanies this reprint, from which we learn that Lotheissen's father was a judge in Hesse-Darmstadt, and that the future biographer of Molière acquired a taste for the stage by attending the performances in the grand-ducal theatre of his native town.

The "Gadshill" edition of Dickens's works of course begins with the Pickwick Papers, and reflects credit on Messrs. Chapman & Hall. The type is excellent, the paper good, the illustrations are the original ones. Mr. Lang's introduction is piquant and shrewd, but perhaps the allusions to Sir Walter are a little too numerous, and the same pleasant writer's notes are worth looking at. Altogether in these two volumes this new edition has made an excellent start.

Burke's Peerage, Baronetage, and Knightage (Harrison) is once more on our table. Sir Bernard's son is now the editor of this standard work. We hope it will prosper under his supervision as it did under his father's. The part relating to the present century is admirable. Some of the genealogies are in need of the new broom's attention.

An old friend has revisited us this season in the shape of Oliver & Boyd's Edinburgh Almanac (Simpkin & Marshall), one of the best books of the kind published anywhere. It does credit to the old-established firm whose name it bears.—The British Imperial Calendar (Warrington & Co.)—it used to be called "Royal"—is another representative of the old school of almanacs which deserves favourable notice.—Mr. Howe's Classified Directory to the Metropolitan Charities (Longmans & Co.), an excellent compilation, has reached its twenty-second year.—The Baptist Handbook for 1897 (Veale, Chifferiel & Co.) is another well-compiled annual. We cannot say much for the architectural merits of the new chapels of which views are given. Only one or two appear to be successful.

We have on our table Australian Writers, by J. F. Desmond Byrne (Bentley),—Napoleon's Opera-Glass, an Histrionic Study, by Lew Rosen (Mathews),—The Story of Extinct Civilizations of the East, by R. E. Anderson (Newnes),—The Welsh Land Commission: a Digest of its Report, by D. Lleufer Thomas (Whittaker & Co.),—Stories from Waverley for Children, by H. Gassiot, Second Series (Black),—The World Beautiful, by Lilian Whiting, Second Series (Low),—A Mixed World, by A. Pohl (Stock),—The American Heiress, by the Princess de Bourg (Digby & Long),—Belial's Burdens, by J. F. Sullivan (Dent),—Quo Vadis, by H. Sienkiewicz, translated from the Polish by J. Curtin (Dent),—Rhymes from a Rhyming Forge, by Evanus the Song Smith (Birmingham, Cornish Brothers),—A Lover's Breast-Knot, by Katharine Tynan (Mathews),—Echoes from the Mountain, by C. E. D. Phelps (Putnam),—The Supremacy and Sufficiency of Jesus Christ, by Ignotus (Blackwood),—The Gospel for an Age of Doubt, by Henry Van Dyke (Macmillan),—and Laureates of the Cross, Six Sermons, by the Rev. Aubrey N. St. John Mildmay (Stock). Among New Editions we have A History of Nottinghamshire, by C. Brown (Stock),—The Invasion of India by Alexander the Great, with an Introduction by J. W. M'Crindle (Constable),—Fancy Dresses Described, by A. Holt (Debenham & Freebody),—Le Problème de la Mort, by L. Bourdeau (Paris, Alcan),—and There was once a Prince, by Mary E. Mann (Henry).

PROF. MASPERO'S 'STRUGGLE OF THE NATIONS.'

Mr. McClure does not, I am glad to see, dispute the facts of my allegation, though he not unnaturally seeks to minimize their importance. It is not difficult to show that his excuses are inadequate.

1. I made no assumption as to the truth of the critical opinions referred to; they may be as mistaken as it pleases Mr. McClure to believe. Prof. Maspero, however, accepts them as true, and in his original work makes it manifest to all that he adopts them as the basis of his entire representation of Israelitish history. This is what I contend should have been clearly and truthfully indicated to the reader in the translation. If I were to translate a work on, say, geology, and on certain controverted points were to alter systematically the author's text, for the purpose of concealing his opinions, and making it express or accord with opinions of my own, and were then to publish my translation under the author's name, without any indication of what I had done, I should clearly be acting disingenuously towards the public. And this is what has been done in the case of the S.P.C.K.'s translation of Prof. Maspero. In the case of the former volume (the 'Dawn of Civilization'), with some historical conclusions in which the editor did not agree, the author's text was left unaltered; but the editor signified his dissent in the preface. This was a simple and straightforward course; and it is impossible to understand why, if there were parts of the present volume with which the editor disagreed, the same course was not adopted again.

2. The alterations were not "few and trivial," but numerous and important; they were made systematically, and their effect is completely to alter Prof. Maspero's presentation of the history. Indeed, if they had not been deemed important by those who desired them, we may feel quite sure that they would not have been introduced.

3. My use of the word "surreptitious" implied no "rash assumption"; I was speaking, of course, from the point of view of the English public, who will naturally suppose that "the history of the Hebrews to the eighth century B.C.," which the Society's advertisement of the volume states that it contains, is the history as written by Prof. Maspero, whereas it is in reality, in many important particulars, a different history, which has been substituted for his history without the reader's knowledge. The fact that Prof. Maspero gave permission for the alterations to be made does not affect the question. No doubt he did not foresee the inconsistencies in which this permission would land him. As it is, he is teaching in France and England two contradictory things at the same time: in France, for instance, he says that the real details of Samson's history were early forgotten, in England he says that we possess some details of them; in France various narratives are described as "legends" or "traditions," which in England are related as sober history. A better reductio ad absurdum of the position in which Mr. McClure's excuse places the Society could not be imagined. The fact of the permission having been granted ought, of course, to have been mentioned openly.

As I said, my argument implied no assumption as to the correctness of the critical conclusions in question. As, however, Mr. McClure has made some remarks upon them in this regard, I may be permitted to do the same. It seems to me, then, that their adoption by a man of the acknowledged historical power and insight possessed by Prof. Maspero is an indication that they contain, to say the least, a larger element of truth than Mr. McClure is disposed to concede to them. And there are some who will be surprised that if (as the advertisement quoted above states) Prof. Maspero can treat the mention of the Israelites by Mereнphtah with his "usual acumen," this acumen should desert him in his treatment of other periods of their history, and that the conclusions to which it has there led him should be the one part of the volume withheld from the English public.

Verax.

P.S.—Mr. McClure seeks to throw the responsibility for the alterations upon the translator. But the Society is, I presume, responsible for the acts of its accredited agents, and it argues a strange laxity of method if, in a book published by it, changes of this kind could be introduced without its knowledge and sanction.

MR. CHARLES E. WILBOUR.

The death of one who was so well known a figure in Egypt will be felt beyond the large circle of his attached friends, but by none more than by those friends who profited by his accurate learning, and by the large generosity with which he dispensed it to all who sought his advice. Mr. Wilbour was a citizen of Rhode Island, but for some time past had spent part of the year in Paris, and part in his hospitable dahabiyeh, the Seven Hathors, on the Nile. There he had collected a choice library of Egyptological books, together with many inscriptions, Greek and Egyptian. Not only did he read hieroglyphics with unusual facility, but he had made a special study of the Ptolemaic epoch of that script, which is well known to be the most complicated and difficult of comprehension. On these matters it was my privilege to ask his aid, and never did he fail me in his learning and his kindness. It is but recently that he sent me the news, so strange and important to Ptolemaic history, that Arsinoe II. had died in the fifteenth year of her husband's reign, and not at some much later date. This he had found, and read beyond question, in a newly discovered fragment of the Mendes stele. This is but one specimen of his value as a student of Greek Egyptology. But his gentle and genial nature attracted all who met him, especially the natives, who were much impressed by his venerable appearance, and who familiarly called him Abu Duggan (the Father of the Beard). Three years ago I spent some weeks with him in Nubia, and have now before my mind's eye the quiet and deliberate humour wherewith he tempered the rash enthusiasm of his ardent companions. Like most Americans, he was a Home Ruler on principle, and therefore opposed to the English domination in Egypt, but I never heard him speak in favour of the French as an alternative. He seemed to believe in the possibility of native self-management. Modesty and want of ambition prevented him from giving to the world under his own name the stores of knowledge he had acquired. He is, therefore, only known, beyond his circle of friends, by the select few through whom some of that knowledge filtered into books. To these his loss is irreparable.

THE BOOK SALES OF 1896.

II.

Very few really important books are noticeable until the Tudor Frere Sale, held by Messrs. Sotheby on February 14th and three subsequent days. On that occasion 1,074 lots of books sold for 3,748*l*., among them an additionally illustrated copy of Ames's 'Typographical Antiquities,' which Mr. Quaritch secured for 248*l*.; Blomefield's 'Norfolk,' 6 vols., folio, 1739-75, 36*l*. (old calf); first editions of 'Eastward Hoe,' 'Westward Hoe,' and 'Northward Hoe,' three fine copies of plays by George Chapman, Ben Jonson, and John Marston respectively, 25*l*.; a quarto volume of rare tracts, including Naunton's 'Fragmenta Regalia,' first edition, 1642, Blount's 'Hospital for Incurable Fooles,' 1600, and Nicholas Breton's 'A Poste with a Madde Packet,' 1602, 77*l*.; Herrick's 'Hesperides,' first edition, 1648, with the engraved frontispiece by Marshall, 44*l*. (old calf); Ben Jonson's 'His Case is Altered,' 1609, and the same author's 'The Alchemist,' 1612, both first editions, stitched in one volume, vellum, 31*l*.; more rare tracts in one volume, 4to., including Jhone's 'Booke of Honor and Armes,' 1590, Robin Greene's 'Groatsworth of Wit,' first edition, 1592, and the same author's 'Ghost-Haunting Coney Catchers,' 1626, 80*l*.; Orme's 'Oriental Field Sports,' in the twenty original numbers, 1807, oblong folio, 17*l*. (one plate missing); Ovid's 'Metamorphoses,' "mythologized and represented in figures by G. Sandys," Oxford, 1632, folio, 31*l*. (large copy, old English ornamented calf); and Adrian Poyntz's 'New and Singular Patternes and Workes of Linnen,' 1591, 4to., an unbound copy with the original stitching, 12*l*. At this same sale an original copy of 'Pericles,' imprinted at London for Henry Gosson, 1609, 4to., sold for 171*l*. Daniel's copy of 'Pericles' sold for 84*l*.; and by way of contrast it may be mentioned that at the Roxburghe Sale in 1812 a good and perfect example, dated 1608, realized but 1*l*. 15*s*. This was the only acknowledged Shakspearean quarto that came to the hammer during the year, though mention may be made of 'The Two Noble Kinsmen,' 1634, 4to., 9*l*. 5*s*., and 'The Merry Divel of Edmonton,' 1617, 4to., which are sometimes associated with the name of the great dramatist. This last-named piece was bound up with a number of extremely scarce tracts by Thomas Middleton, Rowley, Nat. Field, and other playwrights of the age, which realized altogether the substantial sum of 122*l*.

The last days of February saw a large copy (8¼ in. by 5 in.) of Burns's 'Poems,' Kilmarnock, 1786, which sold for 121*l*. In the following June another copy (8⅛ in. by 4⅞ in.) only brought 70*l*.; but some of the leaves had been torn and soiled. This latter, however, was a book with a pedigree, for it had once belonged to Miss Cream, who was the daughter of the landlord of the Gardenston Arms Inn, where Burns slept in the September of 1787. Very probably the poet had given it to her, for her name was on the title-page in a hand very like his own. Other important books sold about this time comprise 'The Humourist,' 4 vols., 12mo., 1819-20, 55*l*. (original pictorial boards, unopened); a complete set of Cruikshank's 'Comic Almanac,' nineteen parts, 1835-53, 20*l*. 10*s*.; an inflated copy of Forster's 'Life of Dickens,' with many hundred autograph letters (thirty-six of Dickens himself) and views inserted, 252*l*.; and Goldsmith's 'The Traveller,' first edition, 1764, 8vo., 96*l*. (morocco extra by Rivière). This edition of 'The Traveller' is in its way a curiosity, for until quite recently the edition dated 1765 was considered to be the first. The only other copy of the 1764 edition known is in the collection of the late Mr. Locker-Lampson, who described it in his catalogue as "unique." Thackeray's 'Second Funeral of Napoleon' has now dropped to something less than 20*l*., but the Snob and the Gownsman still continue to flourish. The first-named periodical is complete in eleven numbers, printed on papers of various colours, and the Gownsman in seventeen numbers. A set of the two in the original wrappers has sold by auction for as much as 125*l*., which, curiously enough, was the precise amount realized on this occasion for the twenty-eight numbers, bound up in contemporary boards. Then comes one of the imperfect 'Canterbury Tales,' first edition, 1478(?), to which reference has already been made, 1,020*l*. Blades gives the collation as 372 leaves, and several were missing from this copy. In the face of such a price as this Nathaniel Morton's 'New England's Memoriall,' 1669, 4to., 50*l*. (original sheep), passes almost unnoticed. The previous occasion on which a copy of this scarce book had been sold by auction was in December, 1893, when it realized 47*l*. (half morocco).

The Biblical and liturgical library of Mr. H. J. F. Atkinson contained a very extensive assortment of Bibles in English, Latin, German, and other languages, but unfortunately many of them were sadly imperfect. A copy of Coverdale's Bible of 1535 brought 165*l*., though several leaves were missing and a considerable number, including the title, in facsimile. Only one or two perfect copies of this Bible are known. A complete copy of "the Wicked Bible" (1631), as it was christened by the late Mr. Stevens, sold for 10*l*. 10*s*. About six other copies have been unearthed since Mr. Lenox, of New York, acquired what was at the time supposed to be a unique specimen. This Bible obtained its name from the circumstance of its being filled with gross and scandalous typographical errors, not the least reprehensible of which is the omission of the word "not" in the Seventh Commandment. The whole edition of 1,000 copies was ordered by the Star Chamber to be destroyed. One of the two block-books sold during the year appeared in this sale. It was a very early German Dance of Death in folio, but not being of the first importance, and being sold "with all faults," only produced 10*l*. 10*s*. The other block-book went for 320*l*. on November 28th. It was catalogued as 'Historia Conceptionis B. Mariæ, seu de Generatione Christi,' 1471, small folio. A question was raised in the room whether one leaf was not in facsimile, and this example was also sold "with all faults." Among the New Testaments dispersed at the Atkinson Sale were imperfect copies of Tyndale's version of 1536, small 4to., 23*l*., and Coverdale's version of 1538, printed at Paris by Regnault, 24*l*. 10*s*. A very imperfect copy of the 'Golden Legende,' 1527, small folio, Wynkyn de Worde, realized 14*l*. This library contained much that was exceptionally interesting and—mutilated.

On March 19th and following days a library of considerable importance came into the market. It was described as belonging to a "collector," who, judging from the varied nature of the books sold, must have been a man of immense versatility. A good copy of "Joyfull Newes out of the New-found Worlde, Englished by John Frampton," 1596, 4to., realized 10*l*.; Higden's 'Polychronicon,' printed by Caxton in 1482, folio, but wanting all after folio 343, 166*l*.; Chaucer's 'Canterbury Tales,' fifth edition, printed in folio by Pynson in 1493 (?), 200*l*. Of this edition the Althorp copy is the only perfect one known. Of the first edition of 1478 (?) one perfect copy is in the library of George III., British Museum, and another at Merton College. Of the second edition, folio, 1481, but one perfect copy is known. Other books worthy of special notice disposed of on this occasion included Folengo's 'Histoire Macaronique,' 2 vols., 1734, 8vo., 28*l*. (morocco extra by Boyet); the first edition of Goldsmith's 'Deserted Village,' 1770, 4to., 45*l*. (calf extra by Bedford); De Maumont's Works of St. Justin in French, Paris, 1559, folio, bound by Nicholas Eve and decorated with scroll tooling, interlaced and bearing the motto of Grolier, "Portio mea Domine sit in Terra viventium," 92*l*.; the 'Epistolæ' of St. Jerome, printed at Mayence in 1470, with the arms of Fust and Schoiffer in red, 80*l*.; a fine copy (128½ mill.) of the rarest of the Elzevir editions of the 'Imitatio Christi,' Leyden, no date, 10*l*.; the romance of chivalry called after Lancelot du Lac, 3 vols. in 1, Paris, 1533, folio, 17*l*. 10*s*. (morocco extra); 'Paradise Lost,' 1667, 4to., having on the first fly-leaf "For my loving ffriend Mr. Francis Rea Booke binder in Worcestershire," and on the next fly-leaf "Presented unto me by the Author to whom I gave 2 doubl Souveranges," 85*l*.; a copy of the first edition of Florio's 'Essayes of Montaigne, 1603, folio, 23*l*. 10*s*.; and an extremely important collection of statutes printed by Machlinia in 1480, folio, 275*l*. In 1893 a copy of this book, with all faults, brought 85*l*.

The portion of the library of the late Prof. Huxley which had been bequeathed to him by Mr. Anthony Rich contained nothing of interest, and the same must be said of several other collections dispersed in the last days of March and beginning of April. At the Duke of Leeds Sale, held on April 15th, a copy of the first English translation (by Shelton) of 'Don Quixote,' 2 vols., 1612-20, 4to., brought 35*l*.; and Wycherley's 'Miscellany Poems' on large paper, 1704, folio, 46*l*. (old morocco extra). Later in the same month a series of 53 vols. of the "Auctores Classici Græci," Paris, Didot, 1842-51, realized 16*l*. 10*s*. (half calf); and 175 vols. on large paper of Valpy's "Delphin" and "Variorum Classics," 1819-30, 25*l.* (russia extra, a fine set). Each of Valpy's "Delphin Classics" was published at 1*l.* 16*s.* (large paper), and a set numbers 141 vols., a state of things which discloses a dreadful fall. Sir Joshua Reynolds's 'Graphic Works,' 3 vols., 1820-36, original edition, brought 54*l.*; but it would not seem to have been a complete copy, as it is described as containing only 308 plates (should be 356, exclusive of engraved titles).

The late Lord Coleridge's library, which was dispersed by Messrs. Sotheby on May 4th and four following days, was of a very interesting and scholarly character, though it did not contain much of value in a pecuniary sense. There was a long series of Browning's works, mostly presentation copies; a good specimen of the 'Nuremberg Chronicle,' 1493, folio, 20*l.*; a nearly perfect series of publications issued by the Early English Text Society, 1864-94, 38*l.* 10*s.*; Gould's 'Monograph of the Trochilidæ,' with Sharpe's supplement, 1861-87, 37*l.* 10*s.*; 'Purchas his Pilgrimes,' a fine and perfect copy, in 5 vols., 1625-26, folio, 67*l.* (morocco extra by Rivière); Wilkins's 'Concilia Magnæ Britanniæ,' 4 vols., 1737, 23*l.* (morocco extra); and many of the works of Ruskin and other art critics, poets, and essayists of the present century. On May 4th Messrs. Puttick & Simpson sold 'The Byble in Englishe,' printed by Whitchurche on the 29th of December, 1549, folio, for 25*l.*; a good copy of 'Sunday under Three Heads,' in the original wrapper, for 8*l.* 15*s.*; and a slightly imperfect copy of a Book of Hours, 1529, 4to., Paris, Regnault, for 39*l.* 10*s.* Every one will naturally remember the Crampton Sale, held at the commencement of June. This was one of those modern libraries which are founded mainly on the scarcest editions of the scarcest books by English authors of the present century, and some of the prices realized were very remarkable. 'Pauline' went for 145*l.*; Byron's 'Poems on Various Occasions,' Newark, 1807, for 45*l.*; the 'Hours of Idleness,' 1807, large paper, original boards, for 20*l.*; and 'English Bards and Scotch Reviewers,' 1811, 8vo., 29*l.* (morocco extra). This, though described as the fourth edition, was perhaps the fifth, a very important point, because according to some bibliographers the fourth edition of 1811 and a fifth of 1812 (as they say) are quite distinct, and it was the latter which was so effectually suppressed that only a single copy escaped destruction. I cannot pretend to argue this point, especially as the subject was very comprehensively dealt with recently in the Athenæum (May 5th, 19th, and 26th, and June 2nd, 1894). 'The Waltz,' 1813, 4to., sold for 55*l.* (half calf); Coleridge's 'Poems on Various Subjects,' first edition, 1796, 20*l.* (calf, original receipt for thirty guineas inserted); 'Robinson Crusoe,' 1719, 'Farther Adventures,' 1719, and 'Serious Reflections,' 1720, 3 vols., 8vo., 75*l.* (calf extra); 'The Vicar of Wakefield,' Salisbury, 1766, 65*l.* (morocco extra); and another copy of Milton's 'Paradise Lost,' 1667 (the third and last sold during the year), 90*l.* (morocco extra). Perhaps the most noticeable book in the whole collection was Shelley's 'Œdipus Tyrannus; or, Swellfoot the Tyrant,' first edition, 1820, a most rare book, only two or three copies being known, and no other sale being recorded during the past ten years. The price realized was 130*l.*, and for this the purchaser must thank the Society for the Suppression of Vice, which frightened the author into burning his tragedy. Tennyson's 'Window,' 1867, and 'The Victim,' 1867, both appeared at this remarkable sale, and realized 52*l.* and 75*l.* respectively; while Wordsworth's 'Grace Darling,' which was privately printed at Carlisle in 1838, brought 32*l.*

On June 18th the second copy of Burns's 'Poems,' Kilmarnock, 1786, came to the hammer as stated; and Grafton's Bible, "fynisshed in Apryll," 1539, brought 70*l.* (rough calf, some leaves torn). Then comes Chaucer's 'Canterbury Tales,' 1478 (?), to which reference has already been made, 1,880*l.* This is the identical book which it was proposed to present to Mr. Bayard, and which by this time he would have received had the fates been propitious. At the same sale (the best of the whole year from a monetary standpoint, 1,599 lots having realized more than 8,500*l.*) the copy of Eliot's Bible which brought 82*l.* was sold, and also a number of important Books of Hours. Then we must note Holinshed's 'Chronicles,' 1577, folio, 36*l.*; Hubbard's 'Narrative of the Troubles with the Indians,' 1677, 4to., 111*l.*; 'The Boke of Common Praier,' printed by Whitchurche in 1552, 24*l.* (some leaves mended, others in facsimile); a Second Folio Shakspeare, 1632, 75*l.*; a Third Folio, 1664, 43*l.* (six leaves in facsimile); and a Fourth Folio, 1685, 34*l.* During the year the First Folio has sold but once, and the copy was imperfect, 170*l.*; the Second Folio appeared on eight occasions, the Third on one, and the Fourth on eight. Fifteen pounds seems a large sum of money to pay for Stevenson's 'The Charity Bazaar'; but the particular copy was one of a very small number which the author signed when resident in Samoa.

Nearly all the books in the library of Sir Thomas Lauder were remarkable primarily for their bindings, the names of Clovis Eve and Le Gascon being frequently met with. So also the Bunbury Sale in July contained several very fine specimens of bibliopegy. Cowley's 'Works,' 1681, folio, in contemporary English morocco covered with a blaze of gilt tooling in panels, sold for 126*l.*, and there were several specimens of the skill of Roger Payne. The season closed with prices which, on the whole, were low, but some exceptional books must be noticed. These include a special copy of Hanmer's 'Shakespeare,' 6 vols., 4to., 1744, 160*l.*; Smith's 'Historie of Virginia,' 1625, folio, 204*l.* (the four maps genuine and in a fine state); Saxton's maps, 1579, folio, 20*l.* 5*s.* (slightly mended, but complete); Lafontaine's 'Contes et Nouvelles en Vers,' 2 vols., 1762, 8vo., 200*l.* (first proofs before all letters, Pixerécourt's copy of the celebrated "Fermiers Généraux" edition); Laudonnier's 'L'Histoire Notable,' 1586, 8vo., 56*l.*; 'The Acts and Laws of the Province of the Massachusetts Bay,' 1726, folio, 64*l.*; and a complete copy of Reeve's 'Conchologia Iconica,' 20 vols., 1843-78, 87*l.*, half russia.

Possibly, on a very minute survey of the year's book sales, a survey which should omit no single volume of the least importance, there would be one book which would even then stand out above the rest in the estimation of the majority of Englishmen, notwithstanding the fact that there are many others which brought larger amounts. This is the first edition of Walton's 'Complete Angler,' a copy of which, in the original sheep binding as issued, recently sold for the very large sum of 415*l.*, being an advance of 100 guineas on the price previously obtained for a copy in a similar state (310*l.*, March 4th, 1891). Just now a great deal of attention appears to be directed to the angler's Bible, and the number of contemplative men anxious to possess it in the original is so great that it would be highly indiscreet to assert that the high-water mark of enthusiasm has yet been reached. In conclusion, attention must necessarily be directed to two separate collections of works relating to the languages, history, and topography of Spanish America, one of which was dispersed on January 29th, and the other on November 5th. The two together only consisted of 472 lots, producing 635*l.*, and no sensational prices were obtained on either occasion. The books were, however, highly unusual, and in several instances unique or nearly so, and for that reason merit a special word of recognition in the interests of those who affect this class of literature.

A general survey of the book sales of 1896 does not disclose much of superlative interest and importance, and no great ancestral library, such as we may expect to see in the market this year, has been dispersed for a long time. To be in a position to form an extensive collection of books, or, indeed, anything else, should be a matter for congratulation, and if the ancient form of the law of entail could be applied to goods and chattels and enforced, it would perhaps, under those circumstances, be possible to found an everlasting library which would pass religiously en bloc from one generation to another. Nothing short of this will, apparently, be sufficient to protect any library, be it extensive or the reverse, a single moment after the founder of it has passed away. There are, of course, exceptions, but they are extremely few in number—so few that the private collections now existing in this country which have seen even three generations of owners can be counted upon the fingers and are so insecure that any day may be their last. Indeed, the vast majority of those sold by auction carry with them patent evidence that they are not fifty years old; and so the wheel goes round.

SAMUEL TAYLOR COLERIDGE'S NOTES ON COMIC LITERATURE: A FIND.

Helen's Bay, Co. Down, Jan. 1, 1897.

Referring to the interesting article in the Athenæum of December 26th, p. 906, under the above heading, I would, with permission, beg leave to say that I have a book annotated in a very similar manner, also by Coleridge. It is a folio copy of Raleigh's 'History of the World,' 1614, in fine condition. Apparently it was once owned by Thos. Poole, of Nether Stowey, Coleridge's friend, as it bears his signature on one of the fly-leaves.

The ink in which the notes are written has faded to a reddish brown, but the writing is easily read. Some of the notes are of only a line or two, others extend nearly the whole length of the margin, as you describe.

The book has been rebound, but the binder was merciful and spared the margins, leaving the notes untouched. There are also a few pencil marks thus ×.

Literary Gossip.

An article from the pen of Canon MacColl on 'The Musulmans of India and the Sultan' will appear in the next number of the Contemporary Review. The article aims at showing that the Mussulmans of India are no more interested in the Sultan than in any other Mussulman sovereign; that the Sultan is in no sense Khalif or Commander of the Faithful, and was never acknowledged as such in India; that in fact the Khalifat has been extinct for centuries; and that to admit the doctrine that the Sultan of Stamboul possesses any claim on the allegiance of Indian Mussulmans would be a most dangerous policy, and has never been countenanced by any of our responsible statesmen.

The first annual volume of 'Sale Prices' will be published by Mr. Henry Grant at the end of the present month under the title of 'The Sale Prices of 1896.' The work, of which three quarterly parts are already in the hands of subscribers, gives a report of nearly a hundred sales by auction of autographs, manuscripts, coins, drawings, pictures, prints, war medals, relics, tapestry, and a large variety of general objects of artistic and antiquarian interest, with the amounts realized and the purchasers' names. The index is, it is promised, to be full, and the work is to be extensively annotated throughout.

The book is produced under the editorship of Mr. J. H. Slater, the editor of 'Book-Prices Current.'

Madame Belloc, whose volume called 'In a Walled Garden' was much liked last summer, is going to issue a similar book next spring. Its title is 'The Passing World.'

The Delegates of the Clarendon Press have asked the Rev. Henry A. Redpath, Dr. Hatch's fellow labourer in preparing the concordance to the Septuagint which is just finished, to add to it a complete onomasticon.

Messrs. Puttick & Simpson purpose inaugurating a new departure in auctions by holding a sale exclusively composed of book-plates on January 28th. Although the collecting of "ex-libris" has long been in vogue, they have hitherto occurred in the sale-room merely in small quantities, interpolated amongst property of a different character. The present sale, therefore, has the interest of being one by which in many cases a standard of price will be fixed, and the auctioneers are hopeful that it may attract, appealing as it does not merely to the herald or genealogist, but also to the county historian, the student of design, and the lover of engravings.

Mr. A. J. Butler writes :—

"Without wishing in any way to impair the value of the documentary evidence on which Prof. A. H. Keane was able five years ago to show that 'Monomotapa was not a principality, but a prince; not an empire, but an emperor,' I would venture to quote in this connexion a passage written not five, but forty years ago. 'In reference to the name Monomotapa,' says Livingstone, 'it is to be remembered that Mono, Moéne.....mean simply chief, and considerable confusion has arisen from naming different people by making a plural of the chief's name.....the same,' he adds, 'as if we should call the Scotch the Lord Douglases' ('Missionary Travels,' ed. 1857, p. 617). Of course, I do not know what evidence experts want, but to the plain man Livingstone's statement, based, I presume, on some knowledge, seems fairly 'documentary.'"

Messrs. Smith, Elder & Co. will shortly publish a first novel by Mr. Archie Armstrong, entitled 'Under the Circumstances.' Its author has hitherto been chiefly known through his short stories and verse contributed to the magazines and newspapers, and he has had some experience in journalism. He wrote the libretto of 'Dan'l's Delight,' which was acted not long ago at the St. George's Hall by the German Reed Company.

Messrs. Jones & Evans, booksellers, of Queen Street, Cheapside, inform us that they have had stolen from their shop two of the scarcest of the Kelmscott Press books, viz., 'King Florus' on vellum, and the same on paper. The vellum issue was but twelve copies in all, and both disappearing together shows that the thief was educated enough to know the value of his bag. Both copies bore identifiable private marks.

The death is announced of Mr. Maunsell, proprietor and editor of the Dublin Daily Express.—We have also to record the decease of Mr. James Gowans, the well-known second-hand bookseller in St. John's Wood. Mr. Gowans was born near Edinburgh, and was for some years sub-editor of the Courant, and contributed, says the Scotsman, to Blackwood's Magazine. He was for many years Secretary of the Mechanics' Library in Edinburgh, and subsequently became a bookseller in London. He was a man of considerable reading, and wrote a volume on 'Edinburgh in the Days of our Grandfathers.'

Mr. Parker's translation of 'The Works of Dionysius the Areopagite,' which we have already announced, is to appear before long.

The indefatigable Mr. W. B. Hutton, of St. John's College, Oxford, is going to publish a monograph, through Messrs. Longman, on 'The Church of the Sixth Century.' The same publishers promise 'Joy: a Fragment,' by the late Mrs. Sidney Lear. A short memoir of the lamented author is to accompany it.

The County Council of Carmarthenshire is anxious to turn Llandovery School, which celebrated its jubilee the other day, into an intermediate school. This would mean a total change in the system of education pursued. There are now many intermediate schools in Wales, but there are only three or four schools that, like Llandovery, send any number of boys to Oxford and Cambridge, and this Llandovery does with signal success. It would be a retrograde step to interrupt the successful career of so well-managed a school.

Messrs. Smith & Elder did quite rightly in raising the question, as they did the other day with regard to the Review of Reviews, of the right of a reviewer to make inordinately lengthy extracts. If a book is readable, there is no doubt that a certain amount of quotation helps the sale. Sometimes, perhaps, the passages quoted are the only lively ones to be found in the work noticed; but even if the critic says so, the public does not realize it, and feels a wish to see the volumes. But the habit of excessive quotation, which has been on the increase for some years past, is certainly detrimental to publishers, as it tends to exhaust the reader's curiosity, and encourages the growing habit of contenting oneself with glancing at the reviews of new literature. We are glad the Publishers' Association took a part in the matter. Possibly it may be of use after all.

Mr. S. J. Adair Fitz-Gerald tells us we are in error in thinking that we have seen 'The Zankiwank and the Bletherwitch' before. It is quite new. "Perhaps," he adds, "your reviewer remembers a previous fairy tale of mine in a similar vein; I refer to my 'Wonders of the Secret Cavern.'"

Dr. Wilhelm Deecke, of the German Gymnasium at Mulhouse, who died at Strasbourg on January 3rd after a dangerous surgical operation, was one of the foremost authorities upon ancient Etruria and the Etruscans. He was born at Lubeck in 1831, where his father was public librarian. In 1877 he edited the second edition of K. O. Müller's 'Die Etrusker.' His own series of 'Etruskische Forschungen' were issued at intervals from 1875 to 1880. From 1881 to 1884 he collaborated with Pauli in the publication of the successive parts of the 'Etruskische Studien.' In 1871, when the Germans annexed Alsace, he was appointed co-rector of the Lyceum at Strasbourg, where he stayed for ten years and did valuable service in the matter of school reform. His extremely independent criticism of the educational plans of Manteuffel, the imperial viceroy, was the cause of his leaving Strasbourg.

The Leyden Society for the Reproduction of Ancient Manuscripts is about to issue a photographic copy of the oldest known manuscript of Horace, the Berne MS. 363. Prof. Hagen, of Berne, is at work upon an essay dealing with the scientific importance of the MS. for the criticism of Horace and its special palæographical value.

The stamp duty on newspapers, which in Austria has greatly impeded the development of the press, is to be abolished at the beginning of next year. Those papers which are not published more frequently than thrice a week will be exempt from stamp duty next March.

The inhabitants of Säckingen, in the Grand Duchy of Baden, intend erecting a monument in honour of Victor Scheffel, who made their town famous.

It is reported that the Pope thinks of founding an international university at Assisi (Università internazionale Cattolica). We should think this most unlikely. The little Umbrian town is not suited for such a purpose.

The Frankfurter Zeitung records the astounding news that Heinrich Heine has, after all, a monument in Germany. It is near the manufacturing town of Elberfeld, but we regret to say that it consists of a heap of stones only, from the midst of which rises a bare flagstaff. One of the larger stones bears the inscription, "Dem Andenken Heinrich Heines," and another contains the first four lines of a poem from the 'Harzreise,' beginning with the words :

Auf die Berge will ich steigen.

On a third stone are carved the letters "S. v. d. H.," which are the initials of Freifrau Selma von der Heydt, who had the moral courage to brave her countrymen by erecting a monument, though a primitive one, to the greatest lyric poet of modern times.

We are glad to learn, from reports received from Bangkok, that the Siamese Government is breaking with old traditions in assisting in the preparation of a semi-official yearly publication in English, in which the new laws passed since the opening of the Legislative Council in January, 1895, are to be given in an English translation, together with statistics regarding agriculture, trade, and population. The first short introductory volume, resuming previous legislation up to 1895, is to appear in the Siamese new year, April, 1897.

The Parliamentary Papers of the week include a Return giving a List of those Buildings of Architectural and Historic Interest in the United Kingdom of which the Structure and Fabric are maintained by the War Office (1*d.*); Report of the Departmental Committee on Reformatory and Industrial Schools, Vol. II. Evidence and Index (8*s.* 9*d.*); and two further reports on Yorkshire charities.

SCIENCE

SOCIETIES.

Geological.—Jan. 6.—Dr. H. Hicks, President, in the chair.—Messrs. B. Bonthrone, H. A. Pringle, and T. P. Prout, and the Rev. J. N. Vanstone were elected Fellows. M. E. Dupont, of Brussels; Dr. A. Fritsch, of Prague; Prof. A. de Lapparent, of Paris; and Dr. H. Reusch, of Christiania, were elected Foreign Members; and Prof. A. Hyatt, of Cambridge, Mass., a Foreign Correspondent of the Society.—The following communications were read: 'On the Structure of the Skull of a Pliosaur,' by Mr. C. W. Andrews,—'On the Pembroke Earthquakes of August, 1892, and November, 1893,' by Mr. C. Davison,—and 'Changes of Level in the Bermuda Islands,' by Prof. R. S. Tarr, communicated by the Secretary.

Linnean.—Dec. 17.—Dr. A. Günther, President, in the chair.—Mr. F. Roper was admitted, and Sir W. Roberts and Mr. J. H. Burrage were elected Fellows.—Messrs. J. Green and J. H. Gardiner exhibited a series of sciagraphs of British batrachians and reptiles in which the details of the skeleton were very sharply defined, and its relation to the external outline well shown. These sciagraphs, as well as those of a series of mollusca also exhibited, were taken with a Crookes's tube of the ordinary focus pattern, actuated by a powerful induction-coil giving 8 in. sparks, and the prints were made from untouched negatives.—Prof. Howes offered remarks on the series of batrachians and reptiles, and Mr. B. B. Woodward commented upon the details of structure made apparent in the sciagraphs of mollusca. —Mr. J. E. Harting exhibited a supposed hybrid between the common brown hare (Lepus timidus) and the Irish hare (Lepus variabilis) recently obtained in Carnarvonshire, where the latter species had been introduced in 1878. He compared it with examples of both the above-named species, and contrasted their distinguishing peculiarities, pointing out the intermediate characters exhibited by the hybrid.—The President thought that too much stress should not be laid upon external appearance and colour; that the question of hybridity should rather be determined by comparing the relative measurements of the leg-bones; and that the Irish hare should be compared in detail with the hare of Southern Europe (L. meridionalis or mediterraneus).—Prof. Howes drew attention to Nathusius's observations upon the Peyer's patches of the leporines, and pointed to the necessity for examination of the viscera.—Mr. B. Hamilton was inclined to regard the supposed hybrid as an example of the ordinary brown hare turning white in winter, hitherto unnoticed in this country.—Mr. T. Christy inquired what position the so-called Belgian hare or leporine occupied in relation to the question of hybridity, and was answered that the popular notion of that animal being a hybrid between hare and rabbit was fallacious, since it was nothing more than an overgrown tame rabbit coloured like a hare.—Mr. B. B. Woodward gave a demonstration, illustrated with lantern-slides, of M. F. Bernard's researches into the development of the hinge of bivalve shells.—On behalf of Dr. A. J. Ewart, a paper was read in continuation of one previously communicated by him and entitled 'Further Observations on Assimilatory Inhibition.' —Mr. W. C. Worsdell gave the chief facts of a paper dealing with the 'Development of the Ovule of Christisonia, a Genus of the Orobancheæ.' Referring to Prof. Koch's detailed account of the development of the ovule of Orobanche, he remarked that Christisonia as a parasitic plant was of such interest, and differed so much in its vegetative structure from Orobanche, that it seemed to be worth while to record the facts of its embryological development. A brief description of the vegetative parts of the plant was then given; these were the rhizome-like, anastomosing network of roots bearing tubers at intervals, from which latter the exogenously-formed haustoria are produced. The haustoria penetrate the roots of the bamboo or strobilanth, upon which the plant is parasitic. The lateral roots and the stems are derived endogenously; the latter grow rapidly, and after producing the flowers die at the end of the season. The flower resembles, in its main features, that of Orobanche. The ovary in one species is unilocular throughout, in another species it is bilocular below and unilocular above; the placentæ are two in number. By the aid of blackboard drawings the author then described the development of the embryo-sac and the embryo. This was shown to follow essentially the same lines as in Orobanche. Its main features were: the origin of the archesporium from a hypodermal cell; the casual occurrence of a double archesporium; the absence of tapetal cells; the division of the archesporium into four cells, the lowest of which subsequently grew into the embryo-sac (an anomaly was observed in one ovule, in which two of the uppermost cells persisted as rudimentary sacs, in one of which the nucleus had divided into four); the large size of the synergidæ, as compared with that of the corresponding cells at the antipodal end; the outgrowth of the embryo from the ovum as an elongated unicellular structure; the fusion of the polar nuclei; the early stages in the formation of the endosperm; the sequence of cell-divisions in the developing of embryo and the irregularity of these; the extremely rudimentary character of the embryo as compared with ordinary dicotyledonous plants, this being perhaps even more pronounced than in Orobanche. Finally, it was pointed out that in a great many plants the vegetative and the reproductive organs have not always, by any means, a parallel development. A striking instance of this was to be seen in Christisonia. In this plant the vegetative structure was of an abnormal and reduced type, and remarkably different from that of other phanerogams; while, on the other hand, the structure and development of the embryo-sac had remained essentially of the same normal type as in the majority of dicotyledons.—The paper was criticized by Dr. D. H. Scott.—On behalf of Dr. L. O. Howard, entomologist to the U.S. Department of Agriculture, a paper was read 'On the Chalcididæ of the Island of Grenada, West Indies,' dealing with the Chalcididæ collected by Mr. H. H. Smith, under the auspices of the British Association Committee for investigating the fauna and flora of the West Indian islands. The collection consisted of from 600 to 700 specimens, and comprised six new genera and seventy-two new species, which were described. The geographical relationships of the group were discussed.

Society of Biblical Archæology.—Jan. 12. —Anniversary Meeting.—Sir P. le Page Renouf, President, in the chair.—The Secretary's Report for the year 1896 was read.—The following officers and Council for the current year were elected: President, Sir P. le Page Renouf; Vice-Presidents, the Lord Archbishop of York, the Marquess of Bute, Lord Amherst of Hackney, Lord Halsbury, W. E. Gladstone, A. Cates, F. D. Mocatta, W. Morrison, Sir C. Nicholson, A. Peckover, and Rev. G. Rawlinson; Council, Rev. C. J. Ball, Rev. Prof. T. K. Cheyne, T. Christy, Dr. J. H. Gladstone, C. Harrison, G. Hill, Prof. T. H. Lewis, Rev. A. Löwy, Rev. J. Marshall, C. G. Montefiore, W. L. Nash, Prof. E. Naville, J. Pollard, E. B. Tylor, and E. T. Whyte; Hon. Treasurer, B. T. Bosanquet; Secretary, W. H. Rylands; Hon. Secretary for Foreign Correspondence, Rev. R. Gwynne; Hon. Librarian, W. Simpson.

Aristotelian.—Dec. 14.—Mr. B. Bosanquet, President, in the chair.—Mr. E. Thurtell and Miss Dawson were elected Members.—Mr. J. E. McTaggart read a paper 'On Hegel's Treatment of the Categories of the Subjective Notion.'

Jan. 11.—The President in the chair.—Papers were read by the President and Messrs. S. H. Hodgson and G. E. Moore on the question, 'In what Sense, if any, do Past and Future Time Exist?'

MEETINGS FOR THE ENSUING WEEK.

Mon. Victoria Institute, 4½.—'On the Assouan Embankment,' Prof. Hull
— London Institution, 5.—'Experiences at the Afghan Courts,' Mr J. A. Gray.
— Society of Arts, 8.—'Material and Design in Pottery,' Lecture I., Mr W. Burton (Cantor Lecture).

Baker.—The Solution Density and Cupric-Reducing Power of Dextrose, Lævulose, and Invert-Sugar.' Messrs. H. J. Brown, G. H. Morris, and J. H. Millar.—'Derivatives of Maclurin, Part II.,' Mr A. G. Perkin.
— Linnean, 8.—'Origin of the Corpus callosum,' Dr G. E. Smith.—'Minute Structure of the Nervous System of the Mollusca,' Dr J. Gilchrist.
Fri. Physical, 5.—'An Exhibition of some Simple Apparatus,' Mr W. B. Croft.—'The Passage of Electricity through Gases,' Mr E. C. Baly.
— Royal Institution, 9.—'Properties of Liquid Oxygen,' Prof. Dewar.
Sat. Royal Institution, 3.—'Neglected Italian and French Composers,' Mr C. Armbruster.

Science Gossip.

The fiftieth annual general meeting of the Institution of Mechanical Engineers will be held on the evenings of the 4th and 5th of February, at 25, Great George Street. The annual report of the Council will be presented, and the annual election of the President, Vice-Presidents, and members of Council, and the ordinary election of new members will take place on Thursday. The papers to be read and discussed, as far as time permits, are: 'Fourth Report to the Alloys Research Committee,' by Prof. Roberts-Austen; 'Partially Immersed Screw-Propellers for Canal Boats; and the Influence of Section of Waterway,' by Mr. H. Barcroft; and 'Mechanical Propulsion on Canals,' by Mr. L. S. Robinson.

The report of the Committee which has been inquiring into the expenditure of the Central College of the City and Guilds of London Institute, as compared with the results obtained, has now been presented to the Governors of the Institute, by whom the Committee was nominated. The report is regarded as decidedly favourable, and is not expected to lead to any significant changes.

The Professor of Rural Economy at Oxford invites support outside the University for a scheme which would have the effect of making agricultural science one of the subjects of examination for the University degree.

The Geological Society will this year award its medals and funds as follows: the Wollaston Medal to Mr. W. H. Hudleston; the Murchison Medal and part of the fund to Mr. H. B. Woodward; the Lyell Medal and part of the fund to Dr. G. J. Hinde; the Bigsby Medal to Mr. Clement Reid; the proceeds of the Wollaston Fund to Mr. F. A. Bather; the balance of the proceeds of the Murchison Fund to Mr. S. S. Buckman; and the balance of the proceeds of the Lyell Fund to Mr. W. J. Lewis Abbott and Mr. J. Lomas.

On January 5th a monument in honour of the geologist Jaccard was unveiled in the English garden at Locle, in Canton Neuchâtel.

Three small planets were discovered by M. Charlois at Nice on the night of the 31st ult. If all recent announcements prove to be really new, these will raise the number found in 1896 to 20, and the whole number known to 429.

Although but little has been seen of the sun lately, a rather remarkable group of spots was noticed on his disc at the end of last week. We are now nearly half way between epochs of maximum and minimum abundance.

FINE ARTS

Les Tapisseries de Raphaël au Vatican et dans les Principaux Musées ou Collections de l'Europe: Étude Historique et Critique. Par Eugène Müntz. (Paris, Rothschild.)

From its very handsome form and appearing at the present time, it may be assumed that the publisher of M. Eugène Müntz's new work, 'Les Tapisseries de Raphaël,' intended it to obtain some share of the patronage bestowed on that class of literature, the primary aim of which is to serve for New Year's gifts. As the mention of the gift-book, with its usually smart and frequently gaudy cover, its illustrations to match, suggests the proverbial apples of the Dead Sea, it is only fair to say that M. Rothschild's volume is not of this calibre. The cover is, indeed, ornamental, but it is the masculine ornament of the Italian Renaissance, of the period of its matured practice, and before it had lost its original restrained grace of design. And when on turning over the pages the wealth of Raphaelesque invention stands revealed, there is then no hesitation in pronouncing to what category the work belongs. M. Rothschild is generally credited with a tolerably accurate knowledge of the artistic leanings of the book-purchasing public. That he should place this one in the market at this season may be accepted as denoting the existence of a class which still retains a high standard of taste.

The chief interest of the present work, of course, centres on the Cartoons of Raphael. Hence it is with more than ordinary authority that M. Müntz discusses his theme. He is the author of a 'Life of Raphael' which stands in the front rank of the numerous biographies of the painter; he has written a history of tapestry which is accepted as a text-book; and he is further as familiar with the Vatican as he is with the palace, of the collections of which he is the keeper. Readers of 'Raphaël, sa Vie, son Œuvre, et son Temps,' will remember the admirable description and criticism of the Cartoons contained in that work. So also will those who know 'La Tapisserie' recall the reference to the tapestry for which the Cartoons were painted; this series is known as the Acts of the Apostles, there being also two other series of the Raphael cycle at the Vatican, the Scenes from the Life of Christ and the Children at Play (the Giuochi di Putti), the two latter copied from designs by the pupils of Raphael. The 'Tapisserie,' however, is a general history of tapestry, consequently the notices of these particular examples are naturally condensed, while in the present volume, besides being discussed in detail, the designs are reproduced in text illustrations. When stating the end and aim of his work, M. Müntz claims with pardonable pride :—

"C'est la première fois que l'on verra réunis, en reproductions impeccables, obtenues à l'aide des procédés les plus perfectionnés, les cartons de Londres et les tapisseries du Vatican, avec leurs incomparables bordures, ainsi que les nombreuses esquisses originales qui ont servi à préparer ces chefs-d'œuvre. Mais là ne se borne pas l'ambition de l'auteur et de l'éditeur : ils ont groupé autour des Actes des Apôtres, non seulement tous les documents graphiques de nature à en élucider ou à en compléter l'histoire, mais encore les différentes suites qui se réclament du nom de Raphaël : les Scènes de la Vie du Christ, les Enfants jouant, et plusieurs autres tentures peu connues ou même inédites. C'est donc un véritable corpus qui est offert au lecteur. Raphaël, comme tout ce qui est grand et beau, a trouvé des détracteurs en cette fin de siècle. Leurs attaques ne méritent pas de nous arrêter (en quoi importent-elles à la gloire du maître ?), mais elles ont fourni l'occasion de reprendre à nouveau l'analyse du cycle pathétique entre tous qui s'appelle les Actes des Apôtres. De nombreux documents, ignorés jusqu'ici, ont permis de rajeunir un thème qui paraissait épuisé."

Students of the art of Raphael will remember that the known drawings and studies from his hand belonging to his latest period are relatively few, especially when compared with those of his earlier years. The few, however, that we do possess exhibit consummate mastery of drawing. He could still, when occasion required, by the flow of that exquisitely delicate line, design figures infused with a refinement of sentiment recalling the virginal purity of his early Madonnas. Or when the motive required the display of energetic action we see at once that with unerring stroke precisely the right point is reached. He never missed his grip, or weakened its hold by overstrain. Reproductions of a few of the drawings of this class from various collections are given by M. Müntz, and, needless to say, they are of infinite service in studying the finished compositions. In the same way the insertion in the text illustrations of ancient work which had been assimilated by Raphael, like the 'St. Paul visiting Peter in Prison,' from the Brancacci Chapel, enables the reader at a glance to estimate its relation to the figures in the Cartoons; in this instance it is, of course, the Apostle in the 'Paul preaching at Athens.' The same system is continued in the examination of the Scenes from the Life of Christ and the amorini at play. Of the latter series a reproduction of eight charming panels of tapestry in the possession of the Princess Mathilde adds considerably to the interest of the volume.

Respecting the reproductions of the Cartoons themselves, which are in photogravure from negatives taken at South Kensington Museum, it is evident that no pains have been spared in their execution. In some qualities of the design a degree of accuracy is arrived at which could be obtained by no other method. Certain qualities, as those of air and light and colour, can never be attained by the means of printer's ink, although they may, perhaps, be suggested by the hand of a skilful engraver. However, in whatever form they are presented, they will always remain the most valued and, in the best sense of the word, the most popular productions of pictorial art. Protestants and Catholics alike accept them as the highest representation of typical events in the New Testament history. They express the deepest convictions of the Christian faith. Their appeal to the heart is more simple and direct than any words uttered since those which fell from the lips of the Divine Teacher.

M. Müntz quotes a fine appreciation of the Cartoons from the pen of H.R.H. the Duke d'Aumale :—

"Les cartons qui sont, avec les marbres du Parthénon, ce que l'Angleterre possède de plus beau en fait d'art, et qui, dans l'œuvre de Raphaël, n'ont peut-être de supérieur que les 'Stances' du Vatican."

It might, perhaps, be advanced that in some respects they touch a higher point than the frescoes of the Stanze. The latter scarcely reach their breadth of treatment or noble simplicity of form, nor do they always display the dramatic directness of invention, nor, surely, their sublime pathos of expression.

Resuming our notes, we may start from the exquisitely toned portrait of Miss May Prinsep (No. 21); and passing the impressive and original Rider on the White Horse (24), Rider on the Red Horse (28), a second Rider on the White Horse (31), and The Rider on the Black Horse (32), a fine series of illustrations of the Apocalypse, which ends with the Rider on the Pale Horse (36), hardly so successful a work as its fellows, and yet by no means without poetical feeling, we come to the brilliant and solidly painted portrait (life-size, half-length) of Blanche, Dowager Countess of Airlie (34), which illustrates the influence on Mr. Watts of the art of other masters than Titian and Tintoret, who are more especially his models. In No. 34 the firmness and crisp modelling, the brightness of the coloration, and the strength of the local colours remind the connoisseur of Bronzino's polished flesh painting, and there is also present a slight infusion of Bordone's wealth of tone. Very natural and lifelike is the three-quarters-length figure (38) of Miss R. Gurney when a girl, in a black dress, leaning with one shoulder against a wall; and Miss Violet Lindsay (41) is a characteristic portrait of a lady who is now known as the Marchioness of Granby and is herself an accomplished artist. Except for a certain weakness in the expression, suggestive of a less strenuous and masculine character than his ever was, the profile, life-size Sir J. E. Millais (42), painted in 1871, is one of the best likenesses extant of the great artist we lately lost. Comparing it with a photograph taken in the same year of Sir John, which now lies before us, we do not hesitate to assert that, in spite of the deficiency mentioned above, nowhere in the exhibition is there a more faithful and sympathetic picture than No. 42. The painting of the flesh is not unlike Millais's own method of treating the carnations; certainly it could not be fresher or more lifelike. Altogether less successful, on the other hand, is the portrait of Millais's forerunner in the Presidency, Lord Leighton (45), a work of 1890, in which the surface is rougher and the flesh painting is decidedly more opaque. The picture is less luminous than Mr. Watts's usually are, but it is a faithful likeness of Leighton as he was six years ago; it shows how deeply time and suffering had even then told upon the handsome and once robust man. Somewhat austere and imperious, the expression of the face and attitude is quite in harmony with the dignity of the doctor's robe of red, and may, under the circumstances, be true to the life; but it does not express the Leighton of the Academy, of society, and of his own studio. The look of reverie on the face of Mr. Gladstone is less manifest than usual in No. 44, which shows him in a genial and placable mood.

Passing, for the moment, a group of allegories, landscapes, portraits, and two or three fanciful themes, we come to the capital likeness in profile to our left, painted in 1860, of the Duke of Argyll (75), which is not to be overlooked, although close to it hangs the still more vigorous portrait of Mr. William Morris (78), which could hardly be finer, and, being painted in 1880, depicts the poet at his best. Equally happy as a likeness and as a picture, more subtle, as it must needs be, being a rendering of a character more complex and therefore more difficult to paint, is Sir E. Burne-Jones (80), which is certainly one of its artist's masterpieces. Mr. Watts has not done justice to himself in No. 83, a work of 1864. No. 86, Algernon C. Swinburne, also fails, to a certain extent, as a likeness, because it gives the idea of a more robust physique as well as a less highly-strung temperament than that of the author of 'Atalanta in Calydon.'

portraits of ladies is the life-size, full-length, standing figure of the Hon. Mrs. Percy Wyndham (96), in a bronze green dress brocaded with sunflowers in dead gold. Painted in 1877, this is a noble example of the artist's most powerful mood; his masterly treatment of the masses of colour and tone is especially conspicuous, and the style of the portrait cannot be better described than as sumptuous, broad, and simple. The painting of the flesh is remarkable for its solidity, force, and the fineness of its morbidezza. One of the most celebrated beauties Mr. Watts has painted is admirably, if not quite adequately represented in the brilliant whole-length, seated, and life-size figure of The Countess Somers (103), the 'Virginia' of other fine portraits of his. Wearing a silk dress of a bright strong blue, and holding a peacock fan in its left hand, this figure excels most even of those of the painter's works which owe much to the unusual brilliance and gaiety of their colours. One of his beautiful life-size portraits in chalk (none of which is exhibited here) represents the countess in the very prime of her beauty. A faithful likeness and almost perfect piece of flesh painting is the half-length, life-size portrait of Mr. Walter Crane (110), executed in 1891, which proves how wonderfully the artist then retained those powers which were at their acme a quarter of a century before. Such long-enduring vigour is an astonishing fact in the history of our painter. It can be said of no other master, except Titian, that his hand preserved its firmness and felicity of painting so late in life. Mr. Watts has not subsequently surpassed this fine picture of his friend. Of course, he has, even since 1891, exhibited some noteworthy pictures, but none better.

An interesting and good portrait in the North Room, painted in 1874, and best known from Rajon's fine etching, represents the Rev. James Martineau (125) in a sympathetic manner. A much later picture, the character-reading and art of which justify what we have said about the unabated powers of the artist, is the capital likeness of the Marquess of Dufferin (128) in a fur coat. It would be interesting to see side by side No. 132, an unfinished portrait of Sir R. Burton, and Leighton's likeness of the same great traveller, the latest addition to the National Portrait Gallery, which is now (No. 48) in Burlington House. This is the last of the painted portraits in this exhibition. In the Balcony may be seen a large number of excellent photographs by Mr. Hollyer from many of the pictures which are here and some which are not.

It would be unjust to Mr. Watts if we confined our attention to his portraits while there is before us a considerable proportion of those allegories to which his "prefatory note" in the Catalogue refers the visitor. Nor would it be right to omit the praise due to the charming exhibition of playful fancy in the illustrations of poetic legends and historic incidents which adorn these galleries. There are also on these walls some fine landscapes, conceived not in the realistic manner which has obtained favour in this country and France since the time of Constable, but according to the eclectic mode which agrees best with the artist's mind and taste. Of the playful fancies, the earliest is the animated and pretty "How should I your true love know?" (10) which dates from 1841. Una and the Red Cross Knight (16) possesses Spenserian grace and the true romantic spirit. Indeed, it is the best of Mr. Watts's illustrations of 'The Faery Queene.' The colouring of the picture enhances its charm. Britomart and her Nurse (98), a life-size group placed before the magic mirror, though a more complex subject and not so direct a rendering, is as a picture finer than No. 16, and it tells its story with still more power, although, to our taste, the martial virgin's face lacks resolution and that expression of enthusiasm is absent which we expect in her. The fact is, few of us realize Britomart in love.

Uldra (27) and The Nixies' Foster Daughter (35) are examples of the painter's way of looking at Scandinavian legends and of his habit of treating them in an eclectic manner. Uldra is the spirit of the iris that spans the waterfall, and the subject afforded the artist an opportunity for contrasting the vivid hues of the rainbow itself, the whiteness of the rushing stream, and the gloom of the storm clouds behind the half-naked spirit.

Rain Passing Away (58) possesses grandeur such as few would look for in so simple a landscape. It depicts a plateau so wide that, as Patmore wrote,

> The rainbow wholly stands within its lordly bounds.

Under this prodigious arch of light and colour we have a view which suggests the hand of Ruysdael or De Koningh. The telling effect and dignity of the whole is greatly aided by the majestic conception embodied in the mass of white cumuli behind the bow. Neptune's Horses (59) is another and much more recent attempt to use natural means for the expression of abstract ideas, without absolutely reproducing the colours and forms of nature, or, at the same time, completely departing from them. Upon the whole this picture is a most impressive and weird example of what a painter who is also something of a poet can produce with materials which to most men seem prosaic enough, if not commonplace. Of course, nothing is more common than to liken breaking waves to the horses of Neptune; but it is the mysterious wizardry of the moonlight, the half-veiled sky, the formless mist, and the inscrutable darkness of the vast ocean that combine to exalt eclectic landscape, when painted by one whose watchword is, "I paint ideas rather than facts."

The Childhood of Jupiter (60), practically the latest of Mr. Watts's exhibited pictures—it was painted only last year—is already familiar to our readers. Suffice it to say that it is a fine piece of colour which reminds us of Reynolds, but that the drawing is less perfect than usual. Olympus on Ida (68) gave our artist opportunities for displaying the power he has often exercised of treating such subjects. Truly classical in a sense more applicable to art of the later Renaissance than to that of antiquity, this fine, but hardly finished picture is conceived in Mr. Watts's least conventional strain. In this respect it may be classed with The Birth of Eve (87); the beautiful and tenderly dreaming Psyche (88); the passionate and masterly Orpheus and Eurydice (92); the Daphne (93), fading away in deathly pallors, a wonder of refined and graceful execution; and the sculpturesque face of The Wife of Pygmalion (77), a piece of solid and splendid flesh painting. No piece here is a choicer example of this mood than the very fine Diana and Endymion (101), of which there is, by the way, a fine print. Here the dark and fluttering robes of the goddess hovering, before she kisses him, above her lover sleeping on the ground, the exquisite ivory of her flesh in which some roses are latent, the sweetness and ardour of her expression, the grace and naturalness of her attitude, not less than the comeliness and strength of the sleeper, are admirable points. Europa (104) reminds us throughout of Titian. Ariadne in Naxos (113) is a thoroughly characteristic example of a great painter heroically striving against the sordid influences of his time.

That enthusiasm which has never failed to spur Mr. Watts to noble efforts is also manifest in a few pictures of a nondescript kind, the most striking of which is a large work of 1849, an apologue rather than an allegory, which he calls Life's Illusions (64). It represents Beauty, Hope, Ambition, and other types of human aims in life floating before a cavalier in armour who chases a "rainbow-tinted bubble of glory." As critics, we are most concerned with the wealth of colour, the strength of chiaroscuro, and the noble sense of style for which this striking work is remarkable. Most of all, technically speaking, do we admire the masterly painting of the life-size, naked figure of the genius of Beauty. Mr. Watts knew his subject too well to fall into the common error of representing as a spectre that which was solid in the eyes of his cavalier.

As to the large allegories which occupy so considerable a portion of the walls of these galleries, it is not necessary that we should do more than refer the reader to the interesting apologia offered by the artist in the prefatory note to the Catalogue. It contains his explanation of his devotion to them of much of his life and powers. To add anything further, whether we agree with him or not on the subject, would be quite superfluous. Suffice it, then, to name those allegories which, on technical grounds, deserve most of the visitor's attention: Mischief (79), which, as a picture, allies itself with 'Life's Illusions,' and the almost as noteworthy Fata Morgana (84), Love and Death (126), The Court of Death (135), The Spirit of Christianity (136), and Time, Death, and Judgment (144).

Fine-Art Gossip.

THE Burlington Club has formed a numerous and representative collection of the water colours of A. W. Hunt, to which any one fortunate enough to obtain a member's ticket will be admitted.—To-day (Saturday) has been appointed by the Fine-Art Society for the private view of an exhibition of water-colour drawings of English landscape by Mr. Thorne Waite, to see which the public will be admitted on Monday next.

MESSRS. CHRISTIE, MANSON & WOODS sold on the 9th and 13th inst. the following: T. Barker, 'Woody Landscapes,' with figures, a pair, 189*l*. Engravings: 'The Hoppner Children' and 'The Douglas Children,' after Hoppner, by J. Ward, 55*l*.; 'Duchess of Devonshire,' after Downman, in colours, 31*l*.; 'Mrs. Siddons,' after Downman, in colours, 29*l*.; 'St. James's Park and Tea Gardens,' after Morland, in colours, 54*l*.; 'Party Angling,' and 'The Anglers' Repast,' 46*l*.; 'Almeida,' by W. Ward, and 'St. James's Beauty,' after J. H. Benwell, by F. Bartolozzi, in colours, 25*l*.

ALL lovers of the toreutic art, as well as all English admirers of Benvenuto Cellini, will be glad to hear that Mrs. George Simonds has just finished her translation of Benvenuto's two treatises on goldsmithery and bronze-founding. The text she has used for this purpose is that published in Florence, 1568; in the technicalities of her subject the lady has had the advantage of her husband's artistic ability and practical knowledge. These treatises have not been translated before into English, and they acquire an additional charm because they serve as a sort of supplement to Cellini's own delectable account of the casting of his 'Perseus.'

WE have it on the best authority that not 500*l*. or less—as we have always understood, and stated last week—but 600*l*. was the price Lord Leighton received from Her Majesty for 'Cimabue's Madonna carried through Florence.'

MR. BELLA writes from 25, Soho Square, W.: "Might I ask you to be so kind as to rectify in your next issue the statement in the current one that the pictures exhibited at 'The 25 Gallery' are attributed to MM. Menzel (Hon. R.A), Toulouse-Lautrec, and L. Legrand? As they are originals in each case, the present statement is calculated to impair the artistic value of the exhibition."

We should be sorry to impugn the genuineness of the pictures. As we have not seen them, we did not dream of doing so.

Don Juan F. Riaño writes to us :—

"A mould has been taken for the first time of the statue of Meleager in the Madrid Gallery, which belonged to Christine, Queen of Sweden. It is considered to be the best copy existing of the 'Diadumenus' of Polycletus. Casts can be had by applying to the Secretary of the Royal Academy of San Fernando, Alcala 11, Madrid. The price is 100 francs."

We trust the French nation, who may see his 'Haidee and Don Juan,' which, we understand, has been accepted by the authorities of the Louvre, will not judge of the powers and technical skill of Ford Madox Brown by it. It is a bequest of the late Miss Blind, who was ill advised when she offered it. It is, under the circumstances, due to the reputation of the painter and of the English School — already unhappily and inadequately represented in Paris—that we should say this.

The Chronique des Arts of the 9th inst. contains an important article by M. Salomon Reinach on the discovery and condition when found of the statue of the 'Venus' of Milo. The learned author succeeds in clearing away much confusion which has gathered about the matter, although he does not otherwise add to our knowledge of the provenance of the statue, its attitude when perfect (a much debated point), and the intention of the sculptor to whom the world is indebted for the finest female statue.

A memorial to Élie Delaunay has been placed in the museum of Nantes, his native city. In it is inserted a medallion likeness of the painter (in white marble) by M. Chaplain.

MUSIC

THE WEEK.

St. James's Hall.—Popular Concerts.
Queen's Hall.—Promenade Concerts.

Schumann's 'Märchenbilder,' Op. 113, consisting of four movements originally composed for pianoforte and viola, the part for the stringed instrument being frequently taken by the violin or violoncello, was performed as first written on Saturday afternoon last at St. James's Hall, the executants being Mlle. Ilona Eibenschütz and Mr. Alfred Gibson. The charming pianist interpreted three of Scarlatti's pieces with all requisite crispness and purity of style; and Beethoven's perennial Septet in E flat, Op. 20, concluded the programme. Mrs. Helen Trust was judicious in her selection of French and German songs, and artistic in their execution.

On Monday Schubert's Octet, Op. 166, formed the central feature, and was magnificently interpreted by Lady Halle, and Messrs. Ries, Gibson, Clinton, Paersch, Wotton, Reynolds, and Piatti. Perhaps on no previous occasion has this work, which, if not specially characteristic of the composer, is a masterpiece in respect of melody and general beauty, been given more effectively. The programme was headed by Beethoven's Sonata in A for pianoforte and violoncello, Op. 69, which was perfectly played by Mlle. Eibenschütz and Signor Piatti; and the last item consisted of three trifling pianoforte pieces by the Scandinavian composer Ole Olsen, who, as we said on a former occasion, seems to be treading in the footsteps of Grieg. Mlle. Eibenschütz played the little compositions charmingly, and we should like to hear her on the next occasion in some work of greater importance.

It can scarcely be said that the music of the Russian composer Alexander Dargomijsky, who was born in 1813 and died in 1869, is familiar in this country. Judging from the piquant and well-scored trifle 'Cosatchoque,' which was placed at the head of the Queen's Hall programme last Saturday evening, the deceased writer may take a fair place among the composers of the younger Russian school. He wrote three operas, the third of which, entitled 'The Stone Guest,' is based upon the same legend as Mozart's 'Don Giovanni,' and is considered one of the most remarkable and advanced works of the new Muscovite school. Doubtless we shall hear more of Dargomijsky's music in due course. Another novelty on Saturday was a series of four ballet movements from Delibes's last and unfinished opera 'Kassya,' which did not win favour in Paris, notwithstanding the general popularity of the French composer's music. Only the first act and a few pages of the second had been scored, and the completion of the task was undertaken by M. Massenet, who, judging from the present example, dealt with Delibes's light and delicate music in a somewhat too strenuous fashion, that is to say, making too liberal use of brass and percussion. Other items contributed by Mr. Henry J. Wood's fine orchestra were the introduction to the third act of 'Tannhäuser,' and a familiar selection from the third act of 'Die Meistersinger.' The Concord Part-Singers, a quartet of male voices, created a favourable impression.

Musical Gossip.

Reference to our musical calendar will show that the opening week of the brief operatic season of the Carl Rosa Company at the Garrick Theatre, commencing next Monday, is rich in interest, culminating on Wednesday in the first performance in London of Benjamin Godard's 'La Vivandière.'

The first instalment of Rubinstein's "literary remains" has appeared in the journal Vom Fels zum Meer, under the title of 'Gedankenkorb.' It consists of a number of aphorisms, the most characteristic of which is, perhaps, the following pessimistic remark: "To the Jews," says Rubinstein, "I am a Christian, to the Christians a Jew; to the Russians I am a German, to the Germans a Russian; to the classical musicians I am a Zukünftler, and to the Zukünftler a 'retrograder.' Conclusion: I am neither fish nor flesh—a pitiable individual."

The 244th concert of the South Place Ethical Society, Finsbury, next Sunday evening, will be devoted in part to the music of Schubert, in view of the centenary of the composer's birth, now close at hand. The Pianoforte Trio in B flat, Op. 99, and the Pianoforte Duet, Op. 84, are in the programme. One or more items by this master will be included in all the remaining concerts of the season, and on the actual anniversary, the 31st inst., the programme will consist entirely of Schubert's compositions, including the Octet in F. Mr. Plunket Greene will be the vocalist on this occasion.

It would seem that Herr August Bungert's 'Odysseus' Heimkehr,' the third part of a tetralogy, has very great merit, if one may judge by the verdict of the Dresden critics, for the score is not as yet to hand. 'The Homeric World' is the title of the complete work, which, when placed before musicians, will doubtless command attention, for Herr Bungert is said by competent judges to have the capacity to utilize Wagnerian methods with taste and skill.

Somewhat characteristic information as to opera reaches us from Chicago. The Wagner performances have an Italian, Signor Mancinelli, as conductor. The Theodore Thomas orchestra has been engaged, a Polish tenor and an Australian soprano will sing in German, and the chorus in Italian. This may fairly be deemed polyglot opera.

The announcements of the current series of performances by the Apollo Musical Club in Chicago at any rate afford some evidence that the cause of high-class music is not altogether hopeless in the Western city. According to the prospectus, two performances of 'The Messiah' were given on December 21st and 23rd; 'The Rose of Sharon' is to be heard on February 11th, and Dvoràk's 'Stabat Mater' and Goring Thomas's cantata 'The Swan and the Skylark' at the final concert of the season.

DRAMA

THE WEEK.

Shaftesbury.—'The Sorrows of Satan,' a Play in Four Acts. Adapted by Herbert Woodgate and Paul M. Berton from the Novel by Marie Corelli.

The adaptation of 'The Sorrows of Satan' has the advantage over the book that it is not wholly, nor even mainly, self-advertisement. When deprived of her comic environment and of her royal patronage, and no longer occupied in singing pious hymns in her own honour, Miss Mavis Clare, as she is called, plays a notably insignificant part in her own drama, the interest of which centres, as it rightly should, in Lady Sibyl, absurdly misnamed Lady Sybil. This not too fascinating type of modern womanhood, as conceived by a modern woman, has to be let down many pegs. In the novel she is described in the erotic strain familiar in feminine fiction, "her eyes alit with rapture, her lips trembling with passion, her bosom heaving." We hear in poetry of "Woman wailing for her demon lover." In Miss Corelli's prose she does not wail—she hungers, hungers for the kisses of his lips, hungers for the clasp of his arms. This state of famine is, fortunately, not exhibited on the stage, whereon we hear a poor love-sick creature, while listening to the bitter scorn of the being by whom her senses have been surprised, moaning piteously, "I love you, I love you," with monotonous iteration. This deprives the story of a portion of its coarseness, but is not theatrically effective. Miss Granville, who played the part, was apparently tortured by nervousness, and probably will in time make more of it than she at first did. The death scene takes place, necessarily, on the stage, from the effect of some slow corrosive poison. The moment before her eyes close, Rimanez, otherwise Lucifer, favours her with a terrifying glimpse of his real features or appearance, and she dies in the vain attempt to speak his name. An experience kindred to this is, it will be remembered, afforded in the book to the sordid mother of a more sordid daughter. This scene, played well in the main, lifted the play to the highest point it attained. The action in the closing scene is ineffective; the diabolic terrors do not impress, and the manner in which Geoffrey Tempest, having proved himself base, selfish, pitiful, and depraved, is bidden at sword's point accept another chance, is incongruous and almost grotesque. The play is not wholly bad any more than the novel. It has scenes that are theatrically effective, and there are points at which it seizes on the imagination. The worst point about it is the attempt to supply comic relief. This is the one absolutely jarring note in the play. The scenes in which this is done are both conventional and ridiculous. Mr. Bentham and Mr. Ellis, to whose care the hero entrusts his millions, have stepped out of Strand farce, and the Duke of Launceston belongs to Gaiety burlesque. Mr. Waller's presentation of Rimanez realizes fairly well the character of the fiend as conceived by Miss Corelli after Milton. He has not, of course, the splendid physical stature and beauty on which Miss Corelli insists, and "no deep scars of thunder" have "intrenched" his face. He looks, however, picturesque and fateful, and acts and speaks with the requisite mixture of cynicism and earnestness. The speech descriptive of his own fall should, instead of being conventionally though effectively declaimed, have begun conversationally. After a time, as he summoned back his memories, the declamatory style might be adopted. In the book no attempt is made to present any of the marks of diabolic descent. His feet are shapely; the horns and tail with which mediæval imagination invested him are non-existent or carefully concealed; and he is only distinguished from ordinary humanity by his larger stature, shapelier proportions, and nobler mien. Mr. Waller attempts a compromise. He furnishes one proof of diabolic origin in sharp animal ears such as are sometimes ascribed to the great god Pan. This is practically needless, perhaps even discordant. It is, however, far less obtrusive than are the cock's feather and other diabolic suggestions ordinarily assigned Mephistopheles. No other character except Rimanez is of much importance. When the puissant moral graces of Mavis Clare no longer combat on the side of virtue, one wonders from what galley Miss Corelli drew the despicable and sinister personages by which her action is supported. With the exception of Mavis herself and the Prince of Wales, who is dragged into the novel by the neck and shoulders, there is not a character of average respectability or worth to be seen. In assigning to Miss Sheridan the character of the "milk-white dove trooping with crows" the management does not seem to have been very happily inspired. The character was quite ineffective. One or two cynical speeches of Rimanez went well with the public. The advice to Geoffrey, after the detection of his wife's infidelity, to go on a tiger-hunting expedition in India, coupled with the remark, "It is what a great many men do when their wives forget themselves: several well-known husbands are abroad just now," elicited a roar of laughter. Here is a hint to the adapters as to the kind of comic relief they should seek, supposing such to be necessary.

Dramatic Gossip.

THOROUGHLY conventional are the lines on which 'A Pierrot's Life' is constructed. It shows Pierrot timid in love-making, a roué and gambler after marriage, leaving his wife, and coming back, penitent and ashamed, to sue for and obtain pardon. The graceful movements of Mlle. Litini as Pierrot and the comic method of Signor Egidio Rossi commended it to the public, and its reception at the Prince of Wales's was enthusiastic. It is asserted in the score, and has been repeated in some quarters, that the play first saw the light at the Théâtre Déjazet on January 4th, 1893. In fact, it was produced on the afternoon of December 29th, 1892. The matter is of very little importance; but accuracy is, after all, good in its way.

MISS ELLEN TERRY will reappear at the Lyceum on the 23rd in 'Cymbeline.' A revival of 'Olivia' will follow, and hold possession of the boards during the rehearsals of 'Madame Sans-Gêne.'

'THE FREE PARDON,' a drama by Messrs. Phillips and Merrick, will be the next novelty at the Olympic, at which 'The Pilgrim's Progress' was played for nine nights. Miss Elinor Vane, Mr. Charles Sugden, Mr. Abingdon, and Miss Cicely Richards will be in the cast. The theatre will revert to the so-called popular prices.

'DELICATE GROUND,' with Mr. Playfair and Miss Lena Ashwell in the principal parts, was revived on Monday at Terry's Theatre as the opening piece. Miss Lena Ashwell looked admirably well in the Directoire costume of the heroine, and acted with vivacity and spirit. Her associates, Mr. Arthur Playfair and Mr. Cosmo Stuart, were scarcely at their ease. The piece itself is obviously from the French, the original having supplied M. Sardou with some hints for his 'Divorçons.'

MR. FORBES ROBERTSON and Mrs. Patrick Campbell will appear at the Avenue Theatre in about three weeks' time in 'The Enchantress,' a drama by a writer comparatively unknown to the stage.

SOME first-night "obstructionists" have been summoned by a London management and fined. Not a word do we wish to say in favour of those who go to a theatre for the purpose of making an uproar. Let us look, however, on the other side. In "the best-regulated theatres" a noisy claque is now generally secured. Whether or not it is a signed article in agreements we know not, but so soon as an act is over the box-keepers and attendants of every class come within the auditorium, and express "in the usual form" their contentment with the performance. If they neglected this duty it would be at their peril. By the efforts of these officials and the persistence of a few friends of the actors or the management a false appearance of success is often conveyed and encores are forced on a reluctant public. If the management is to express its own delight, a reasonable amount of dissent may surely be allowed the public.

WE hear of the death, in his fifty-ninth year, of Agostino Gatti, since 1879 joint lessee with his brother Stefano of the Adelphi Theatre. The deceased had recently returned from a prolonged visit to Italy, undertaken in the search after the health which had failed him.

THE NEW CATALOGUE OF BRITISH LITERATURE FOR 1896.

A BIBLIOGRAPHICAL RECORD OF THE PUBLICATIONS OF THE YEAR, ARRANGED IN A NUMERICAL SEQUENCE, WITH FULL DETAILS OF THE BOOKS, AND HAVING TWO INDEXES:—

1. Authors.
2. Subjects and Titles.

Price, cloth, 5*s*. net;

"Duro-flexile" binding (half-pigskin), 7*s*. net.

The NEW CATALOGUE presents complete details of the Books of the Year in such a form that reference for any particular work is both quick and certain.

Each Book in this Catalogue is to be found in the Index under three or more distinct alphabetical headings, viz.:—(1) Author, (2) Title, and (3) Subject (with cross-references).

This is the only British Bibliography compiled with the direct co-operation of the Publishers.

In issuing the First Volume of this Catalogue we claim that its methods of production is a distinct advance upon what has hitherto been effected, in that all the information it contains is specially and directly forwarded to us by the whole body of London and Provincial Publishers.

Every effort is being made to establish equally confidential relations with the Learned Societies and Editors of all Privately Printed Books.

A want has long existed of a yearly volume which shall be at once a reliable and complete record of all publications, and it is hoped that this plan of co-operative compilations will enable us in the future to produce a bibliographical record which will fulfil the need so long experienced by all having much to do with books.

In a recent report issued to their members, the Publishers' Association speak of it as follows:—"After a careful examination of Mr. Chivers's Bibliographical scheme, we consider that there is so much good in it, that we recommend individual members of the Association to assist in making it as nearly perfect as possible."

N.B.—The volume will contain no advertisements of any kind.

CONTRIBUTIONS to a BALLAD HISTORY of ENGLAND.

Athenæum.—"These ballads are spirited and stirring; such are 'The Fall of Harald Hardrada,' 'Old Benbow,' 'Marston Moor,' and 'Corporal John,' the soldier's name for the famous Duke of Marlborough, which is a specially good ballad. 'Queen Eleanor's Vengeance' is a vividly told story. Coming to more modern times, 'The Deeds of Wellington,' 'Inkermann,' and 'Balaklava' are excellently well said and sung. As a book of ballads, interesting to all who have British blood in their veins, Dr. Bennett's contribution will be welcome. Dr. Bennett's ballads will leave a strong impression on the memory of those who read them."

SONGS for SAILORS.

Morning Post.—"Spirited, melodious, and vigorously graphic."
Daily News.—"Very spirited."
Pall Mall Gazette.—"Really admirable."
Morning Advertiser.—"Sure of a wide popularity."
John Bull.—"Very successful."
Metropolitan.—"Instinct with patriotic fire."
Illustrated London News.—"Right well done."

By JOHN C. FRANCIS.

"A fascinating page of literary history."
Illustrated London News.

"No other fifty years of English literature contain so much to interest an English reader."—Freeman.

"Rich in literary and social interest, and afford a comprehensive survey of the intellectual progress of the nation."—Leeds Mercury.

"The entire work affords a comprehensive view of the intellectual life of the period it covers, which will be found extremely helpful by students of English literature."—Christian World.

"A worthy monument of the development of literature during the last fifty years.....The volumes contain not a little specially interesting to Scotsmen."—Scotsman.

"We have put before us a valuable collection of materials for the future history of the Victorian era of English literature."—Standard.

"The thought of compiling these volumes was a happy one, and it has been ably carried out by Mr. John C. Francis, the son of the veteran publisher."
Literary World.

"The volumes abound with curious and interesting statements, and in bringing before the public the most notable features of a distinguished journal from its infancy almost to the present hour, Mr. Francis deserves the thanks of all readers interested in literature."—Spectator.

"It was a happy thought in this age of jubilees to associate with a literary chronicle of the last fifty years a biographical sketch of the life of John Francis.....As we glance through the contents there is scarcely a page which does not induce us to stop and read about the men and events that are summoned again before us."—Western Daily Mercury.

"The book is, in fact, as it is described, a literary chronicle of the period with which it deals, and a chronicle put together with as much skill as taste and discrimination. The information given about notable people of the past is always interesting and often piquant, while it rarely fails to throw some new light on the individuality of the person to whom it refers."—Liverpool Daily Post.

"It is in characters so sterling and admirable as this that the real strength of a nation lies.....The public will find in the book reading which, if light and easy, is also full of interest and suggestion..... We suspect that writers for the daily and weekly papers will find out that it is convenient to keep these volumes of handy size, and each having its own index, extending the one to 20 the other to 30 pages, at their elbow for reference."
Liverpool Mercury.

"No memoir of Mr. Francis would be complete without a corresponding history of the journal with which his name will for ever be identified.....The extraordinary variety of subjects and persons referred to, embracing as they do every event in literature, and referring to every person of distinction in science or letters, is a record of such magnitude that we can only indicate its outlines. To the literary historian the volumes will be of incalculable service."

ANIMAL EPISODES.*

"If you sit up late to finish a book, and if during the night you dream weird and creepy dreams of venomous blue snakes pursuing you up blazing telegraph posts from which you tumble down through miles and miles of space into a green, slimy moat haunted by hideous, scaly reptiles, it is a reasonable presumption that your book was a sensational one. Mr. Powell's short stories, which have been collected from Macmillan's Magazine, Temple Bar, and elsewhere in a volume under the title of 'Studies in Sensation,' may be relied upon to produce the effects referred to. They are told with a graphic realism which may sometimes be blood-curdling, but which is never revolting. The tale of how Stoffles the Cat killed the Blue Dryad Snake in fair fight is an excellent piece of writing, worthy of being bracketed in honours with Rudyard Kipling's Mongoose and Cobra story. The escape from the fire at St. Michael's Mansions is thrilling to the point of intensity, and the Reresby Mote Ghost is a gruesome but fascinating horror. Those who like to feel their flesh creep will enjoy the book all the more for the excellence of the literary workmanship."—Westminster Gazette, Jan. 11.

A FEW WORDS ABOUT THE BLICKENSDERFER TYPE-WRITER.

It is NOT a reproduction or hash-up of any existing machines on which the patents have run out.

It is NOT an IMPROVEMENT on them.

It is an entirely new departure in Type-writer mechanism. The root idea in its construction is simplicity; in place of 2 to 3,000 parts it has only about 200. As a result of this simplicity we have a machine which is

PORTABLE (weight 6lb.), SPEEDY, DURABLE, and CHEAP.

It has a complete Key-board, with 84 Letters and Characters. It is fully warranted, and yet it is sold for

PHILIPS' NEW HANDY GENERAL ATLAS of the WORLD.

Edited by GEORGE PHILIP, Jun., F.R.G.S.

NOTE.—This Atlas, which is entirely of English origin and manufacture, will be found infinitely clearer, more attractive, and easier of reference than the Foreign Atlases which are being so widely advertised in this country.

JUST PUBLISHED, small 4to. cloth gilt, gilt edges, 10*s.* 6*d.*

Containing 72 Maps, 100 Pages of Letterpress, and COMPLETE INDEX of 20,000 Names.

PHILIPS' READY REFERENCE ATLAS of the WORLD.

With a Statistical Survey of each Country. By E. G. RAVENSTEIN, F.R.G.S., Hon. Fellow of the Geographical Societies of Edinburgh, Amsterdam, Lisbon, and Frankfurt-on-Main.

OPINIONS OF THE PRESS.

The Pall Mall Gazette says:—"The first cartographical work published for the New Year. The maps are clearly drawn and printed, and all the boundaries affected by recent treaties or political developments are carefully marked. This atlas will be found most useful for immediate reference, and the statistical survey is a great acquisition."

The Scotsman says:—"Invariably clear and legible and printed with exceptional neatness. For a book containing so much information the volume is of unusually handy size—useful for anybody who needs to have constantly at hand a trustworthy and manageable storehouse of geographical and statistical details."

THE BENIN DISASTER AND NIGER CAMPAIGN.

UP the NIGER. By Captain A. F. Mockler-Ferryman, F.R.G.S.

of 'Through Masai Land.' Crown 8vo. with numerous Maps and Illustrations, cloth, 4*s.* 6*d.*

"An open sesame to colloquial French."—Journal of Education.

PSYCHOLOGICAL METHODS OF TEACHING AND STUDYING LANGUAGES.

FRENCH SERIES.

By VICTOR BÉTIS, Director of the Norman School of Languages, Boston, Mass.; and HOWARD SWAN, Director of the Central School of Foreign Tongues, London.

No. 1. The FACTS of LIFE, idiomatically described and systematically arranged, forming a Text-Book for the Methodical Study of the French Vocabulary. In 2 Parts.

Part I. HOME LIFE—The SCHOOL—TRAVELLING—PLANTS. Demy 8vo. cloth, 3*s.* Class Edition (in 3 Books), demy 8vo. paper cover, each 1*s.*

Part II. ANIMALS—TOWN LIFE—SOCIAL LIFE—INDUSTRY—GOVERNMENT. [In preparation.

Oxford Review.—"A thoroughly workmanlike production, and should go far in reducing the difficulties which all have to surmount in learning a tongue other than that to which they have been accustomed."

Educational Review.—"The plan of the book seems, indeed, a most admirable one; and the other parts now in preparation will, when complete, form with this one an actual summary of all phrases in use in French every-day life."

No. 2. CLASS-ROOM CONVERSATIONS. A graduated set of Elementary Exercises for Practice in Conversation. Demy 8vo. cloth, 2*s.* 6*d.* Class Edition (in Three Books), demy 8vo. paper cover, each, 1*s.*

Cambridge Review.—"This work is excellently printed and contains some very excellent conversations. The teacher will find an enormous quantity of very useful matter here; he will learn how to teach a class and how to vary his method of expression.....If it were carried out the class would be far more interested than they are now in their French lessons at most public schools. The work is full of life."

INTRODUCTORY.

FIRST FACTS and SENTENCES. A collection of Simple Scenes described in Easy Language for the use of Beginners, forming an Introduction to the 'Facts of Life.' [In preparation.

Specimen Copies of the above will be forwarded post free on receipt of one-half the published price.

Specimen Pages and detailed Prospectus sent gratis.

By T. A. V. FORD, M.R.C.S. Eng., Assistant Master at Hailebury College. Containing numerous Examination Papers, with Answers. Crown 8vo. 224 pages, cloth, 3*s.* 6*d.*

Education.—"The author's aim has been to provide a class-book which shall be of practical utility both to young draughtsmen and to more advanced students, and he is to be congratulated on the satisfactory way in which his object is accomplished. We are glad to note the happy arrangement by which the proofs are placed separate from and opposite to the problems, a system greatly facilitating the studies of the pupil. There is no doubt that the little volume now before us will meet with the appreciation of both students and teachers."

Detailed Prospectus, with Specimen Pages, gratis on application. A Specimen Copy will be forwarded to Principals or Teachers desirous of examining same on receipt of one-half the published price.

MY THEATRICAL AND MUSICAL RECOLLECTIONS.

By EMILY SOLDENE.

The World says:—"A frankness that is as irresistible as it is sometimes daring, an ebullient good-humour, a love of fun that never flags, and a genuine gift for light descriptive writing have enabled Miss Emily Soldene to produce one of the most diverting and readable autobiographies of recent years. The lively collection of professional gossip and reminiscence which she has published under the title of 'My Theatrical and Musical Recollections' by no means depends for its interest entirely upon its personal narrative of a bright and successful career, nor even upon its abounding references to well-known contemporaries and colleagues of Miss Soldene in the two professions in connexion with which, as actress and singer, she became so prominent a public favourite. Apart from all such details, interesting as they are to playgoers with theatrical memories dating back to the days of the 'Grand Duchess' and 'Geneviève de Brabant,' there is revealed in these pages an infectious gaiety, an adroit drollery in the description of persons and events and in the presentation of anecdotes, and an utter absence of affectation or professional vanity that render them, in their own way, nothing short of delightful."

MR. JOHN O'LEARY'S AUTOBIOGRAPHY.

RECOLLECTIONS of FENIANS and FENIANISM. 2 vols. with Portraits, 21s.

"I do not remember to have read a more honest book than Mr. O'Leary's 'Recollections of Fenians and Fenianism.' Mr. O'Leary makes no attempt whatever to put another face on Fenianism, either fairer or stronger, than it had in his eyes, when it is not as he would have it seem to be and not as he would have had it be, but as it really was to his knowledge. He writes in admirable idiomatic English, but neither rhetorically nor dramatically.....He is simply thinking aloud.....A most candid, striking, and instructive piece of autobiography."—Sketch.

BY THE AUTHOR OF 'FROM KITCHEN TO GARRET.'

The WAY THEY SHOULD GO: Hints to Young Parents. By J. E. PANTON. 3s. 6d.

"Mrs. Panton as cleverly teaches young parents how to bring up their children as she has in a former work taught young couples how to furnish and order a house 'From Kitchen to Garret.'"—Lady's Pictorial.

MR. GLADSTONE describes this as "A BEAUTIFULLY EXECUTED WORK."

HISTORIC CHURCHES of PARIS. By Walter F. Lonergan. Illustrated by Brinsley S. Le Fanu and from Photographs. Crown 4to. cloth gilt, gilt edges, 21s.

"The perusal of this handsome volume, finely illustrated by Mr. Le Fanu, will greatly add to the enjoyment of those turning their steps Paris-wards."—Morning Post.

"Mr. Lonergan's part in this handsome and valuable book has been done most satisfactorily. The proportions of his mixture of history, legend, and architecture are admirably planned. He has given us a book to read, and not merely to refer to."—Bookman.

"TWO HANDSOME VOLUMES."—TIMES.

PACATA HIBERNIA. Edited, and with an Introduction and Notes, by STANDISH O'GRADY. With Portraits, Maps, and Plans. 2 vols. medium 8vo. half-calf, 42s. net.

 EDITION LIMITED TO 500 NUMBERED COPIES.

"The new edition will undoubtedly attract hundreds, and probably thousands, to properly study a subject hitherto confined to the class of historical students. The introductory matter is full of information and sound sense, and treated in a thoroughly workmanlike manner."—Daily Telegraph.

TWO NEW VOLUMES OF VERSE.

SONGS and BALLADS of YOUNG IRELAND. Edited by MARTIN MACDERMOTT. Fcap. 8vo. with Portraits and Biographical Sketches. 2s. 6d.

"This beautiful volume is the most complete collection that has ever appeared of the poetry that gushed so copiously out of the heart of Ireland."—Irish Monthly.

The POEMS of JOSEPH SHERIDAN LE FANU. Edited and with a Memoir by ALFRED PERCEVAL GRAVES. Fcap. 8vo. with a Portrait of Le Fanu. 3s. 6d.

"Publishers, printers, and editor are all to be thanked for this well-timed, well-printed, well-edited little book."
Academy.

NEW NOVELS.

A BIT of a FOOL. By Sir Robert Peel, Bart., 6s.

"A clever and readable book.....The dialogue is often witty; the style is bright and unpretentious, and the interest in the narrative never flags."—Pall Mall Gazette.

The UGLY MAN. By the Author of 'A House of Tears.' 3s. 6d.

"We doubt if there has been any tale of imaginative mystery better done since 'Dr. Jekyll and Mr. Hyde.'"
New Saturday.

The CIRCASSIAN. By Morley Roberts and Max Montesole. 3s. 6d.

"The joint authors carry the reader far from the beaten track. The scenes, the sentiments, the general aspect of the natural and the human world have here a wild and exhilarating freshness."—Athenæum.

A STAR SAPPHIRE. By Mabel Collins. 6s.

YOUNG MRS. STAPLES. By Emily Soldene. 3s. 6d.

"'Young Mrs. Staples' has certainly the qualities of vivacity and go."—Globe.

The DUNTHORPES of WESTLEIGH. By Christian Lys. 6s.

"Even a jaded reviewer found 'The Dunthorpes' kept him awake until long after midnight."—New Saturday.

The BISHOP'S AMAZEMENT. By David Christie Murray. 3s. 6d.

CYNTHIA: a Daughter of the Philistines. By LEONARD MERRICK, Author of 'This Stage of Fools.' 2 vols. At all Circulating Libraries.

"One sits through the story with very genuine pleasure and rises from the reading of it with indubitable refreshment.....His portrayal of the development of Cynthia is an exceptionally fine and artistic piece of work.....There are more good things to be said about the book, and we are quite in the humour for saying them. But we restrain ourselves, hoping that we have said enough to make everybody wish to read it."—Daily Chronicle.

"A good, sound, rattling tale of thrilling adventure..... Like 'The Red Badge of Courage,' 'Captain Coignet' yields a richer fund of entertainment than the mere glory of romance. The actors in their habit as they lived play out their parts before us.....All these matters, and a thousand more equally terrible, and related with equal vividness, we find in the pages of this incomparable French narrative."
Morning Leader.

THE SENSE OF BEAUTY.

BEING THE OUTLINES OF ÆSTHETIC THEORY.

BY

GEORGE SANTAYANA.

Crown 8vo. cloth.

"It may be said at once that the book is excellently done. So far as we know it stands as the best guide, in compact form, to the student of the theory of æsthetics. As a general rule the style is admirable, both lucid and engaging. Prof. Santayana has no little natural eloquence. He abounds in happy phrases, in felicitous illustrations and quotations drawn from a range of reading wide enough to include Xenophon and Rudyard Kipling."—New Saturday.

"Especially in the chapters on expression and form there is much suggestive and ingenious thought: there is the power of precise expression, and fine writing is avoided. Old subjects, like the pleasure of tragedy, are treated with freshness, and the book as a whole is a careful and conscientious study."
Daily Chronicle.

"A conscientious and well-considered attempt to systematise the 'scattered commonplaces' of criticism."—Morning Post.

"It is a book which will be read with pleasure and with profit by all who take an interest in matters of artistic taste and opinion."—Scotsman.

"The writer has performed his task with conspicuous success, and has expounded his subject with unusual lucidity."
Glasgow Herald.

"The feature of the book is its difference from the ordinary philosophical treatise. It is written in a clear, idiomatic English style, free from grandiose description, and yet with a simple dignity in picturing the higher reaches of fancy. . . . It will appeal to the ordinary reader by the way in which it unifies and explains his experience and emotions—by the simple and intelligible attitude adopted towards the feelings of the beauty of landscape, of the stars, of the sea in the night time, of painting, music, sculpture, and literature. And although it is in no way hortatory in aim, it will effect such an understanding of his own feelings in the average man as will help him to see the way in which men differ in æsthetic appreciation, and to qualify himself—unconsciously—for feeling the delight in that beauty that affords most satisfaction—and satisfaction at all only—to the keenest, finest, and most cultivated tastes."

The Autobiographies of Edward Gibbon. Edited by John Murray. (Murray.)

Private Letters of Edward Gibbon (1753–1794). With an Introduction by the Earl of Sheffield. Edited by R. E. Prothero. 2 vols. (Same publisher.)

LORD SHEFFIELD and Mr. Murray alike deserve to be congratulated on the issue of these interesting volumes, one of which contains the six narratives out of which Maria Holroyd constructed, with truly admirable skill, the celebrated autobiography that has done so much to preserve Gibbon's fame, while the other two contain the letters from which the first Lord Sheffield printed judicious extracts, and add a number of others which have not been before published.

The present Lord Sheffield has undoubtedly done wisely in considering that the lapse of a century has released him from obedience to the injunction of his grandfather that nothing more should be given to the world from Gibbon's papers than he had either printed or left marked for publication; but it is difficult to agree with the assertion that "many of the most piquant passages that Gibbon ever wrote were suppressed by the caution or the delicacy of his editor and his family." We cannot think that in saying this the Earl has done justice to the skill and tact with which the first lord and his daughter constructed from the six narratives before them the autobiography that they printed. As published in an augmented form in the second edition, it contains, it seems to us, nearly everything of value to be found in the sketches that the historian composed. That when he caught at his friend's idea that he should write an autobiography, Gibbon should have put on paper so many versions is characteristic of the man who says of his great work:—

"Many experiments were made before I could hit the middle tone between a dull Chronicle and a Rhetorical declamation; three times did I compose the first chapter, and twice the second and third, before I was tolerably satisfied with the effect."

But the successive versions most of them repeat with slight variations the same facts and sentiments, and the original editors pieced together the narrative so adroitly that they left out hardly anything that was of interest. The omissions seem, as the present Lord Sheffield says, to have been mostly dictated by a regard for the reputation of their deceased friend. Thus occasionally a phrase has been omitted that seemed to do little credit to Gibbon's heart. For example, in the narrative which Mr. Murray has rightly placed first, he says of the loss of his mother:—

"As I had seldom enjoyed the smiles of maternal tenderness she was rather the object of my respect than of my love: some natural tears were soon wiped."

This was erased, as well as the equally cold reflections on his father's death:—

"The tears of a son are seldom lasting..... Few, perhaps, are the children who, after the expiration of some months or years, would sincerely rejoyce in the resurrection of their parents; and it is a melancholy truth, that my father's death, not unhappy for himself, was the only event that could save me from an hopeless life of obscurity and indigence."

An interesting sentence in Memoir B, in which he gives a vivid idea of the difference of tastes between him and his father, was expunged:—

"When he galloped away on a fleet hunter to follow the Duke of Richmond's foxhounds, I saw him depart without a wish to join in the sport; and in the command of an ample manour, I valued the supply of the kitchen much more than the exercise of the field."

When Gibbon complacently remarks that he would have been a good match for Mlle. Curchod, "her parents," says the published biography, "honourably encouraged a connection," but Memoir B adds, "which might raise their daughter above want and dependence"; and a little lower down Gibbon, who never seems to have quite forgiven his old flame for the brilliant marriage she made, somewhat spitefully remarked in a passage hitherto unprinted:—

"The Dutchess of Grafton (now Lady Ossory) has often told me that she had nearly engaged Mademoiselle Curchod as a Governess, and her declining a life of servitude was most probably blamed by the wisdom of her short-sighted friends."

The sketches in Memoir B of M. Pavilliard, the pastor at Lausanne to whose care he was consigned after his conversion to Romanism, and of Madame Pavilliard, were apparently regarded as too outspoken:—

"But truth compells me to own, that my best præceptor was not himself eminent for genius or learning. Even the real measure of his talents was under-rated in the public opinion: the soft credulity of his temper exposed him to frequent imposition; and his want of eloquence and memory in the pulpit disqualified him for the most popular duty of his office."

"The Minister's wife, Madame Pavilliard, governed our domestic œconomy: I now speak of her without resentment, but in sober truth she was ugly, dirty, proud, ill-tempered and covetous. Our hours, of twelve for dinner, of seven for supper, were arbitrary, though inconvenient customs; the appetite of a young man might have overlooked the badness of the materials and cookery, but his appetite was far from being satisfied with the scantiness of our daily meals, and more than one sense was offended by the appearance of the table which during eight [?] successive days was regularly covered with the same linnen."

The following remark on Voltaire seems also to have been considered too bitter: "But it was not without much reluctance and ill-humour," says Gibbon in Memoir B, speaking of the performances at Monrepos,

"that the envious bard allowed the representation of the Iphigenie of Racine. The parts of the young and fair were distorted by his fat and ugly niece, Madame Denys, who could not, like our admirable Pritchard, make the spectators forget the defects of her age and person."

A passage in Memoir C regarding his residence at Buriton is a characteristic account of his religious scepticism:—

"After my library, I must not forget an occasional place of weekly study, the parish Church, which I frequented commonly twice every Sunday in conformity with the pious or decent custom of the family. I deposited in our pew the octavo Volumes of Grabe's Septuagint, and a Greek Testament of a convenient edition; and in the lessons, Gospels, and Epistles of the morning and evening service, I accompanied the reader in the original text, or the most ancient version of the Bible. Nor was the use of this study confined to words alone: during the psalms, at least, and the sermon I revolved the sense of the chapters which I had read and heard; and the doubts, alas! or objections that invincibly rushed on my mind were almost always multiplied by the learned expositors whom I consulted on my return home. Of these Ecclesiastical meditations few were transcribed, and still fewer have been preserved; but I find among my papers a polite and elaborate reply from Dr. Hurd (now Bishop of Worcester), to whom I had addressed, without my name, a critical disquisition on the sixth Chapter of the book of Daniel. Since my escape from Popery I had humbly acquiesced in the common creed of the Protestant Churches; but in the latter end of the year 1759 the famous treatise of Grotius (de veritate Religionis Christianæ) first engaged me in a regular tryal of the evidence of Christianity. By every possible light that reason and history can afford, I have repeatedly viewed the important subject; nor was it my fault if I said with Montesquieu, 'Je lis pour m'edifier mais cette lecture produit souvent en moi un effet tout contraire,' since I am conscious to myself that the love of truth and the spirit of freedom directed my search. The most accurate philosophers and the most orthodox Divines will perhaps agree that the belief of miracles and mysteries cannot be supported on the brittle basis, the distant report, of human testimony, and that the faith as well as the virtue of a Christian must be formed and fortified by the inspiration of Grace."

Mr. Murray has done his readers a service by printing the narratives entire, and placing them one after another. It is a fortunate thing he has done so, for future editors will probably economize space by printing merely the chief variants from Lord Sheffield's text in an appendix; but the student of Gibbon will always accord a preference to the edition before us.

The two volumes of letters have been prepared for publication by Mr. Prothero with exemplary diligence, and he has annotated them in a manner that shows a comprehensive knowledge of the period they embrace. The majority of them are now printed for the first time; in others the passages that Lord Sheffield omitted have been restored, and names which he left blank have been filled in. In fact, nothing could be more satisfactory than the editing. It cannot, however, be said that Gibbon shone as a letter-writer; he was negligent of the letters he received (in fact, Lord Sheffield tells him, "You are so awkward and careless about letters that I do not like to write to you, except about matters that might be published at Charing Cross"), and he seems not to have been over fond of writing.

Many of his letters are short, and a number of them are dry reading, because they are mainly concerned with money matters, which Gibbon did not manage particularly well. When he let his farm at Buriton, his tenant proved unsatisfactory; and although he fancied he had sold his Bucks estate for 20,000*l.*, the purchaser declined to complete his bargain, and when the property was finally sold, eleven years subsequently, it only produced some 15,500*l.* When touching on political matters Gibbon writes in a cold and dissatisfied tone. He seems to have been aware of the charge that he had sold his vote to Lord North for a seat on the Board of Trade; and he writes as if he were trying to shut his eyes to the lamentable results of the policy he supported by his "silent vote." The letters to his stepmother are the best, and yet they lack sparkle. The following extract, apologizing for his shortcomings as a correspondent, is a fair specimen:—

"I am still alive, and in spite of the influenza perfectly well. But why have you not at least written one line in so very long a space of time? All that I can say on the subject is to declare with the utmost sincerity that not a single morning has arisen without my forming the resolution to write before the evening, and that not a single evening post-bell has rang without sounding the alarm to my conscience. In the mean time, days, hours and weeks have imperceptibly rolled away: a perpetual hurry and long days of Parliamentary business, the whole world coming to town at once, and a great deal of occupation at home relative to my History, which will come out some time after Christmas. In a word, I do not like to write to you, but I want very much to see you."

This is a great contrast to some letters from Lady Maria Holroyd in the latter part of the second volume. It is amusing to observe that her father actually had the courage, on his visit to Lausanne in 1791, to tell his old friend of the shortcomings of the house and garden on which he prided himself. On his return to England, Lord Sheffield wrote:—

"I have not thought so bad of your taste, since I heard the vile unmeaning masses are removed from your Terrace, and I hope most of the vulgar flower-pots. You have not given a tolerable reason for preferring a bed-chamber which cannot have a good approach, without indeed a very great expence. What I propose, may be done without spoiling your Library, and without disturbing you in that comfortable room.....The alteration of the staircase would do away the most awkward entrance I ever saw into an House at a very small expense."

Gibbon twenty years before had told Lord Sheffield that "your drawing-room will never do"; but this plainspoken criticism is more than a sufficient retort. Mr. Prothero might have told in a note if any part of Gibbon's house at Lausanne remains. Other nations, when they desire to commemorate a great man, put up a monument to him, but the Swiss call an hotel after him. As every one knows, an "Hôtel Gibbon" covers the ground that was the historian's garden, but Mr. Murray's red handbook says the house, although greatly altered, is still in existence.

There are few misprints in these handsome volumes, and none of consequence. Gibbon was careless, and very possibly he spelled Burgersdicius "Burgers' dicius," as Mr. Prothero represents him as doing; but it is difficult to believe he wrote "Plâit au ciel" for plût au ciel.

The Chronicles of a Virgin Fortress: being some unrecorded Chapters of Turkish and Bulgarian History. By William V. Herbert. (Osgood, McIlvaine & Co.)

MR. HERBERT'S 'Defence of Plevna' will unquestionably command a hearing for his second book. His experience as an officer in the Turkish service and his personal acquaintance with the country lend his history a certain authority, and to this he adds the information derived from certain papers handed to him by another officer of the Ottoman army, and by an Austrian Jew of Widdin, the "Virgin Fortress" which gives a title to his book. We must say we should have liked it better if Mr. Herbert had authenticated his documents by some name or reference which could be tested; but, on the other hand, we must admit that we have not found his facts inaccurate so far as we have been able to test them. The book is, of course, in the nature of a specialist's work: it will not appeal to those who are not interested in the history of the Balkan provinces; but even these may find something to challenge attention in the annals of an invincible fortress, round which many a critical fight has been waged. Mr. Herbert knows how to tell his story with effect, and a tendency to "smartness" and epigram may be condoned in consideration of the really excellent manner in which he has treated his main subject.

The early history of Widdin is dismissed in about thirty pages, when we reach the outbreak of the Crimean War, and the chief interest of the chronicle consists, not in battles and sieges, but in three prominent leaders—Pasvan Oglu, Omar Pasha, and Osman Ghazi. But before referring to these we ought to cite Mr. Herbert's humorous description of Widdin itself. It is too long to quote in entirety, but an extract will show his manner:—

"What a charming town was Widdin [in 1877] at a safe distance! Seen from the height of the hills, four to five miles away, with its white house fronts, its patches of dark green foliage, its towering castle, its thirty-three slender and graceful minarets, its twenty domes—breaking the monotony of housetops and chimneypots which is so fatal to the beauty of many a western city—with the blue waters of a majestic river embracing it, and the background of Roumania's green, fertile, sheep-studded plains, flooded with the spring sunlight, when the landscape had just drunk its fill in the heavy April showers—Widdin, such as I beheld it for the first time, presented a picture of surpassing loveliness. Secondly, what a dirty, squalid, rickety, dilapidated town was Widdin. The streets were tortuous, narrow, dark, badly paved.....everything was crooked and out of the horizontal, and most of the houses were decidedly out of the perpendicular.....fully one half were in ruins, fully a fourth were unoccupied.....Widdin was essentially a town of insects. Never before have I beheld or felt so much vermin congregating in one place. Flies and bluebottles of astonishing pertinaciousness and greed; big, full-bodied, bloodthirsty fleas by the million; bugs, ants, lice, mosquitoes, wasps, cockroaches, and blackbeetles; all sorts and conditions of multipeds, European and Asiatic; swift-winged tormentors and nasty crawling things; little dots of mites, and horned monsters a couple of inches long; scores of species never named, never classified, never dreamt of by our naturalists, each palsied house, each crazy hovel, each uncleanly, overcrowded room, each rotten board, each piece of furniture, and each native pariah—human, canine, or feline—was a breeding place for teeming myriads. The bluebottles actually alighted on the spoons and forks as they were led to the mouth; horrible carrion-worms a foot long crawled about the streets in perfect security.....Fifthly, lastly, and most emphatically, Widdin stank. Heavens, how it stank! Of gutters serving as drains; of sewage, offal, and every description of dirt collected in the thoroughfares," &c.

On the whole, Widdin does not strike us as a particularly agreeable place to live in. There appear to be (or have been in 1877) no amusements, no society, and only a magnificent chance of catching something unpleasant. On the other hand, there are points in its history which every one will admire, and nothing is more curious than the development of Widdin's famous resident—

"the transformation of Michael Lattas, Croatian deserter, viâ the intermediary stages of Omar Effendi, scribe and absconding debtor, Captain Omar, teacher of writing to the imperial family, and Colonel Omar Bey, victor of Beksaya, to the goal of Omar Pasha, commander-in-chief of the Ottoman army during the Crimean War."

Mr. Herbert's vigorous description of the thirty-six days' siege of the Virgin Fortress in the winter of 1877–8 will be read with special interest. This testimony to the courage and steadiness of the Turkish garrison—which held out and repulsed the besiegers even after Plevna had fallen—agrees with what Moltke said. Indeed, Mr. Herbert is a thorough admirer of the gallant Turk, though he is not blind to the vices of his leaders. Altogether, this is a book to be read; but to obtain the true local flavour one ought first to dine with Mr. Herbert on Danube sprats, boiled rice, coffee, and a glass of Slivovitz, in the dingy restaurant overlooking the river, and kept by the renowned Mr. Schlobberoboffskovitzki, whose very name is an epitome—if epitomes may be stretched out—of the history and ethnology of the place.

The Diary of a Citizen of Paris during "the Terror." By Edmond Biré. Translated and edited by John de Villiers. 2 vols. (Chatto & Windus.)

THAT the period here dealt with, being modern and circumscribed, demands from the archivist far less labour than the treatment of earlier times is a fact which need not deter us from congratulating M. Biré on having achieved for his chosen epoch that which more than fifty years ago M. Monteil did for the old régime in that monument of research his 'Histoire des Français des divers États.' Nor would it be fair to ignore the art with which an immense amount of details—culled mostly from contemporary newspapers, but not infrequently also from rare books, pamphlets, and posters — is interwoven so deftly as sometimes to make the reader forget that the journal is avowedly that of an imaginary person.

The citizen's record covers the thirteen months which, beginning with the first meeting of the Convention and the abolition of the monarchy, September 20th, 1792, saw the execution of the king the following January, and ended with the retributive justice, as it is here deemed, which extinguished the Girondists by means of the guillotine, October 31st, 1793. Quotations from the speeches and writings of the Conventionnels are illuminated by authenticated and admirably introduced references to the surroundings and personal characteristics, not only of the leaders of the several factions, but also of the more prominent of their followers. We see the Convention as it appeared to those who frequented it. We recently traced the unconscious fashion in which Duquesnoy, a member of the Constituent Assembly, gradually became an ardent patriot; and now not the least interesting portion of the work under review is the chapters dealing with the similar, if less irreproachable transformation of Royalists into Conventionnels and regicides. We cannot, however, altogether concur with the conclusion which M. Biré draws therefrom. Marat, we are told, "was no Republican before the Revolution." In 1790 he wrote that the monarchical form of government was the only one befitting France. In February, 1791, he declared in the Ami du Peuple that, "taking Louis XVI. altogether, just as he is, he is the king we want. We ought to thank Heaven for him and pray for his long life." In former days M. J. Chénier had in the dedicatory epistle of his 'Charles IX.' exclaimed, "O Louis XVI.! king of justice and of mercy! you are indeed fitted to be the leader of the French." Again, Brissot, when writing in 1780 on the rigour of the penal laws, argued that

"to regicides especially no mercy must be shown. Can we regret that the executioner's art exhausted its resources on such creatures as Châtel, Ravaillac, and Damien, monsters sent from hell to plunge our nation into grief? My pen refuses to calculate the punishment due to such crimes."

"General, I am more Royalist than you," was Danton's reply to Lafayette in the summer of 1792 (a not altogether unbiassed expression of opinion, for the Jacobin was at the moment accepting large bribes from the Court party). Numerous outbursts of monarchical fervour down to the same comparatively late date are also quoted from such men as Camille Desmoulins, Couthon, Barère, Gorsas, Lequinio, Gensonné, Sergent, and many others, thus giving colour to Desmoulins's assertion that "on July 12th, 1789, there were perhaps not more than ten Republicans in Paris." Brissot's estimate was still lower, for in 1791 he held that "there were only three Republicans, Buzot, Pétion, and himself." In October, 1792, he asserts that "the majority of the French were sighing for the monarchy and the constitution of 1791"; that "in the towns people pretend to be sans-culottes because they are guillotined if they are not"; that in reality "they hate a government imposed upon them by fear." "From all this evidence," says M. Biré, "it may safely be concluded that France was still Royalist in 1792, that the very men who proclaimed their Republican opinions so loudly were at heart no Republicans"; and that this sufficiently explains "the origin and cause of the persecution, outrages, and crimes into which the Republic of September 22nd was led." Then, for instance, was Charlotte Corday's victim a Royalist in disguise? We ourselves hold that men change their opinions with circumstances, and that they have a right to do so. It is well to remember that the summer of 1792 saw Europe in arms for the invasion of France, for the destruction of her new-born constitution, and for the spoliation of her territory. In Prudhomme's Révolutions de Paris, No. 172, is a print of the execution of nine young émigrés in the Place de Grève. The scene of butchery is ghastly enough, the mob of spectators brutal enough; but from one of the windows of the Hôtel de Ville floats a banner; its inscription, "Citoyens, la Patrie est en danger," explains and apologizes for the crime. For as Prudhomme wrote in his New Year's number for 1793:—

"Français, vous ne pouvez rester plus longtemps dans l'état douteux où vous êtes; il faut que l'année 1793 dénoue ce grand drame politique dont vous êtes les premiers acteurs; il faut que cette année la république française soit tout à fait assise sur sa base, ou démembrée ou redevenue monarchie. Votre France touche à l'épuisement."—Rév. de Paris, No. 182.

The Terror was patriotism driven mad, an aspect of which M. Biré seems to have an inadequate perception, but which was always present to Carlyle, who could recognize that

There is some soul of goodness in things evil,
Would men observingly distil it out.

The belief that

"the Providence so derided by the Girondists had taken pleasure in making them traverse the same painful path along which they dragged Louis XVI., in reproducing in the incidents which accompanied their fall each of those which marked the fall of the monarchy," induces M. Biré to compare more minutely than we remember to have seen attempted before the events of the 20th of June and the 10th of August, 1792, days so fatal to the Crown, with those of the 10th of March and the 2nd of June, 1793, which were similarly disastrous to the Gironde. He ends a series of striking coincidences by discovering retribution for the death of Marie Antoinette in the fate of her bitter enemy Madame Roland. If Mirabeau could describe the former as the "only one man" the king had about him, Madame Roland, says our author, might with equal truth be considered as the only man among the Girondists, for though these "possessed neither the virtue nor the humanity of Louis XVI., they showed the same indecision and the same weakness."

Among the innumerable details with which these pages abound we find Brissot wishing to place the Duke of York upon the French throne, whilst Carra proposed in all seriousness to secure it for the Duke of Brunswick. A useful chapter gives the number of active citizens and of electors belonging to each of the forty-eight sections of Paris, together with their respective places of meeting. There is an elaborate dissertation on the pictures at the Salon of 1793, when "the scarcity of religious subjects is compensated for by the abundance of mythological ones." We are told at which of the different theatres Talma and the leading actors are appearing; we have summaries of and extracts from various plays, the performance of which attracts the enthusiasm of the public or the censure of the Government. There are descriptions of the fêtes, of the restaurants, of the expiring Académie Française, of the University, of journalism, of literature; almost all these subjects offer some such anomaly as is presented by the publication by the ill-fated Florian of his 'Fables.' "Placed before us at the very height of the Terror," said the Abbé Morellet,

"on the morrow of the establishment of the Revolutionary Tribunal, this charming book, with its bright and happy verses, its pure and harmless morals, seems to me like a lamb that has strayed from the fold and fallen amongst wolves."

Well told also is the account of the "Midnight Mass" on Christmas Eve, 1792. However, among the foot-notes to that chapter is a quotation between inverted commas from Prudhomme; a portion of it has, without any hint to the reader, been modified beyond recognition. The original (Rév. de Paris, No. 181, p. 45) is, in fact, too blasphemous to be reproduced; this might have been stated, or the quotation entirely omitted.

M. Biré has greatly added to the value of his work by the conscientiousness with which he supplies for every statement his authority, chapter and verse. We have tested several of the references to the Moniteur and to Prudhomme's journal Les Révolutions de Paris, and have found them, with few exceptions, correct. But most of the works the author has utilized are beyond our reach. On one occasion, indeed, having been told to "see the curious pamphlet.....by La Harpe entitled 'Le Salut Public,'" the reader is informed in the same note, "This treatise is now nowhere to be found" (vol. i. p. 349, note 2). We think there must be some error either in the original authority, the Chronique de Paris, or else in the copying therefrom to account for the houses in France being estimated at so low a number as 260,000 (vol. i. p. 335). The translation is able and often spirited, the rendering of the ballads decidedly successful. Nevertheless, has not Mr. de Villiers made a slip when we are told that Louis XVI. "abolished the cross-examination of prisoners"? We have not M. Biré's original French edition, but we suspect the words there used to have been "question préparatoire," i.e., the torture of accused persons prior to their possible conviction (vol. i. p. 137). We should have preferred Caracci to "Carracches," and do not know why Pétion should throughout be defrauded of the accent. We do not like General "Hanriot," nor "Korsaint," nor "Sir Francis d'Ivernois." We misdoubt "the Earl of Catherlong." "At least a hundredweight of bread" (vol. ii. p. 171) hardly equals the original "jusqu'à cent pains de quatre livres à la fois" (Rév. de Paris, No. 197, p. 159). Vol. ii. p. 230 contains a remark, "It is therefore not entirely patriotism," &c., which, belonging to the text, has been erroneously incorporated with a quotation from Prudhomme. The reference in vol. ii. p. 39 to the Moniteur of April 14th, 1793, should be to April 16th, and that in vol. ii. p. 12 to the Moniteur of April 1st, 1793, we have failed to verify, with one or two others.

A Bibliography of the King's Book or Eikon Basilike. By Edward Almack, Member of the Bibliographical Society. (Blades, East & Blades.)

Mr. Almack has attempted to solve one of the most difficult bibliographical problems, and has treated it with great minuteness and elaboration. His descriptions of the examples of different editions which he has scrutinized are very detailed and very systematic: measurement, type, signatures, paging, and arrangement of contents in each copy are exactly stated, whilst forty-eight facsimiles of title-pages facilitate the task of identification. Amongst the other illustrations are also facsimiles of the title-pages of works relating to the 'Eikon' (such as Milton's 'Eikonoklastes' and the 'Princely Pelican'), reproductions of watermarks, and four very beautiful coloured plates representing the binding of some early copies of the 'Eikon.' A facsimile of an autograph prayer in the handwriting of Charles I., written about February, 1632, and closely resembling the second prayer appended to the 'Eikon,' adds further to the interest of Mr. Almack's volume.

As to the number of editions published, the author's conclusion is as follows :—

"I own I am not ready to write a definition of an edition, but I count that at least 24 editions were printed before March 25th, 1649, and another 20 before the end of the year, all these 44 editions being in English. In 1649 there were also three in Latin, four in French, one in German, and two in Dutch. This makes 54 editions in the first year. It was again printed at least 8 times before 1800, and no less than 6 times in the present century. These figures added together make 68 editions."

In the addenda Mr. Almack describes two other editions which came into his hands after the writing of his preface.

On the question of the first edition and the date of its appearance, the author's conclusion is that the copy in the Thomason Collection in the British Museum, which Thomason's note on the fly-leaf terms "the first impression," is in reality the second, or rather a later issue of the first edition. This is based on the fact of certain errors in the pagination of one of the sheets of the earlier issue, which are corrected in Thomason's copy. Thomason dates his copy February 9th, which has hitherto been accepted as the approximate date of the first appearance of the 'Eikon.' Mr. Almack, however, argues that the 'Eikon' appeared on the very day of the king's execution, basing his argument on the fact that a copy of the uncorrected first issue contains at the foot of the title-page the inscription, "Eliza Cope, 1648, Jan. 30th." The defect in his argument is that there is no evidence that the date given in the Cope copy is meant to represent the date of acquisition of the book; it may merely be meant to commemorate the date of the royal martyr's death.

Considering Thomason's position and the rapidity with which new publications generally reached his hands, it is extremely unlikely that, if the 'Eikon' was published on January 30th, ten days would have passed before he obtained a copy. Till better proof of the earlier date is forthcoming, it must be taken for granted that the 'Eikon' first appeared in the second week of February, 1649.

While the bibliographical portion of Mr. Almack's work deserves great praise, his critical preface on the authorship of the 'Eikon' is of singularly little value. It is prolix, rambling, badly arranged, and full of mistakes. Mr. Almack reprints a number of documents and extracts from pamphlets bearing on the Gauden controversy. A collection of these documents properly arranged and edited would have been a highly useful supplement to his bibliography, but they are carelessly printed by him and jumbled together in the most casual fashion. To devote ten pages to printing in extenso the table of contents of the 'Reliquiæ Sacræ Carolinæ' is pure waste of space, and it would have been sufficient to reprint the documents contained in Mr. E. J. L. Scott's preface to the 'Eikon' without reproducing the whole of his essay. The arguments adduced by Mr. Scott in favour of the king's authorship and those which justify the attribution of the 'Eikon' to Bishop Gauden were stated at length in the Athenæum when Mr. Scott's edition first appeared (Athenæum, May 29th and June 12th, 1880). Though there is nothing in Mr. Almack's restatement of the case to overthrow the conclusions arrived at in those articles, it seems to necessitate a summary of the reasons for accepting Gauden's claim.

By itself the claim which Gauden put forward at the Restoration would not be conclusive, for he was not particularly scrupulous about the truth of his statements. In this case, however, his statements are confirmed both by internal and external evidence. The internal evidence is so strong that it would be sufficient, even without the external. The style of King Charles, as his letters show, was naturally simple and unpretentious, though sometimes a little cumbrous and involved. Gauden, on the other hand, in his letters as in his controversial works, is one of the most rhetorical and artificial writers of his age. Like Sir Hudibras,

> He could not ope
> His mouth, but out there flew a trope.

Now, as Mr. Todd pointed out seventy years ago, and as Mr. Doble has proved more recently and in greater detail, the style of the 'Eikon' is the style of Gauden, and not that of Charles I. The vocabulary of Gauden, the phraseology, the metaphors, the illustrations, the playing on words, every characteristic and every trick of Gauden's style, are all to be found in the 'Eikon Basilike.'

In the second place, the ideas and the sentiments expressed in the 'Eikon' are tainted with the same artificiality as the style. As we read it we feel that we are listening to the utterances of a literary puppet, not to those of a real man. The trail of the preacher is over it all. Carlyle expresses this feeling with his usual vigour:

"I struggled through 'Eikon Basilike' yesterday; one of the prettiest pieces of vapid, shovel-hatted, clear-starched, immaculate falsity and cant I have ever read. It is to me an amazement how any mortal could ever have taken that for a genuine book of King Charles's. Nothing but a surpliced Pharisee, sitting at his ease afar off, could have got up such a set of meditations."

The temper and the character of the real king were quite different from the temper and character of the monarch represented in the 'Eikon.' The 'Eikon' breathes throughout a settled melancholy and a studied resignation: it represents the king as expecting a violent death and a martyr's crown from the very beginning of the civil war. In reality, Charles was almost to the end of his life sanguine and confident, ever devising fresh combinations and looking forward to the ultimate recovery of his power. His letters to the queen during 1645 and 1646 are a curious contrast to the reflections which the 'Eikon' attributes to him during that period. Contemporary compilers—William Sanderson, for instance, in his 'History of Charles I.'—pepper their pages with extracts from the 'Eikon' as expressing the king's feelings at the different turns in his fortune. Clarendon, who knew better what the king's feelings really were, never quotes the 'Eikon' at all, but frequently refers to the king's letters. On one occasion he deliberately makes a disparaging comparison between the 'Eikon' and a letter from Charles to Prince Rupert. "The ensuing letter," he says,

"was so lively an expression of his soul that no pen else could have written it, and deserves to be transmitted to posterity as a part of the portraiture of that incomparable king, which hath been disguised by false or erroneous copies from the true original."

Mr. Almack fails to appreciate the significance of the external evidence in support of Gauden's authorship no less than the importance of the internal evidence. Clarendon's acceptance of Gauden's claim is the most decisive testimony to its validity. At first, like other Royalists, Clarendon had accepted the 'Eikon' as written by the king. Writing to Nicholas in April, 1649, and referring to the passages in the 'Eikon' which concern the queen, he calls it "the immortal monument he hath left of his transcendent affection to and value of her Majesty." In 1662 he reluctantly admitted his knowledge that Gauden was the author. To Gauden's repeated claim he replied:—

"The particular which you often renewed I do confess was imparted to me under secrecy, and of which I did not take myself to be at liberty to take notice, and truly when it ceases to be a secret I know nobody will be glad of it but Mr. Milton: I have very often wished that I had never been trusted with it."

Mr. Almack prints all the letters which Gauden addressed to Clarendon and Bristol in support of his claim. He omits altogether Clarendon's answer to the claim, which Dr. Wordsworth so laboriously and unsuccessfully endeavoured to explain away.

The new evidence adduced in favour of the king's authorship of the 'Eikon' consists of two things. One of these is an extract from the catalogue of Prince Rupert's library, in which Charles I. is twice described as the author of the 'Eikon.' This is about as conclusive as an attribution of the Pentateuch to Moses in the same catalogue would be.

The second piece of evidence is a petition addressed by William Dugard to Charles II. about December, 1660, in which he enumerates his services to the royal cause, and includes amongst them the printing of "The King's incomparable 'Eikon Basilike,' which he received from Mr. Simmons, his Majesty's Chaplain." There is nothing in this which contradicts Gauden's story, for the witnesses on both sides agree that Simmons was the person who conveyed the manuscript to the printer (see pp. 92, 99). The question in dispute is from whom Simmons received it, and on that point the document throws no light. The postscript of the petition, on the other hand, with its endorsement of Gauden's story about the date of the composition of his 'Stratosteliteutikon,' supplies another proof of the suspiciously close relations between Dugard and Gauden.

The Thackerays in India, and some Calcutta Graves. By Sir William Wilson Hunter, K.C.S.I. (Frowde.)

Every one knows that Thackeray was born in Calcutta, but before the publication of the present work probably few beyond Anglo-Indians had realized how widely and deeply rooted in the services of the East India Company, and intimately associated with its history, was the manly Yorkshire family of which the great novelist was the culminating genius. The Thackerays formed a typical Anglo-Indian family during the most active and glorious period of the Company's administration. They threw out branches into every one of the Company's services—civil, military, and medical—and by the network of their intermarriages created for themselves a ruling connexion both in India and in the Court of Directors at home. The clear and comprehensive manner in which all this is brought out in Sir W. W. Hunter's latest volume renders it of considerable value to the future biographer of Thackeray, and constitutes its highest interest for the general reader.

Describing the preparation of the book, Sir William writes:—

"While wandering over the three Presidencies I noted down some of their [the Thackerays'] many appearances in the old manuscript records, from the Malabar coast on the extreme south-west to the Sylhet Valley in the far north-east of India. No published account exists of them; but I have been allowed to make use of a private family book of the Thackerays, compiled chiefly by an aunt of the novelist. The two sets of materials, when brought together from the Indian archives and the domestic papers, furnish a curious picture of one of those powerful and compact, but now almost extinct, family corporations which did so much to build up British rule in the East."

The first Indian Thackeray was William Makepeace, the sixteenth and youngest son of Dr. Thomas Thackeray, Head Master of Harrow from 1746 to 1760. This William Makepeace, the grandfather of the novelist, was sent out to India in the Bengal Civil Service in 1766, in his seventeenth year, and rose to distinction as the first British Resident in Sylhet. In 1776 he married Amelia, the daughter of Col. Richmond-Webb and the sister of Mrs. Peter Moore, the novelist's guardian, and one of the three originals—the other two being Richard Becher, his mother's kinsman, and Sir Richmond Shakespear, his chivalrous cousin—from whom, so Sir William Hunter conjectures, Thackeray "touched off with so tender a pathos" the noble bearing of Col. Newcome under the loss of fortune in old age. It is a trifle which has escaped Sir William Hunter's observation that the Christian name of Thackeray's guardian, Peter Moore, was transmitted to at least five well-known Anglo-Indian families in the generation immediately following his own. Nothing could more pertinently illustrate the "undivided family" organization of the East India Company in the prime of its beneficent monopoly.

Of the twelve children of William Makepeace (who died 1813) and Amelia Thackeray, who died in 1810, Sir William gives biographies of nine. The eldest, William, was in the Madras Civil Service, chiefly under Sir Thomas Monro. He rose, indeed, to be President of the Board of Revenue, and provisional member of the Madras Council in 1820. But he did not long enjoy these honours, and, being obliged to take sick leave to the Cape of Good Hope in 1822, died on the voyage. "The whole Presidency," writes Sir William,

"lamented his loss. Sir Thomas Monro recorded a last tribute to 'his integrity and long, zealous, and able services.' The Government went into public mourning for fourteen days. A 'Gazette Extraordinary' ordered 'that the flag of Fort St. George be immediately hoisted half-staff high, and continue so until sunset this evening, and that minute guns, forty-seven in number, corresponding to the age of the deceased [he died in his forty-fifth year], shall be fired from the ramparts of Fort St. George.' William Thackeray's true memorial is to be found in the great State Papers which he wrote and in the prosperity of the provinces to which he brought justice and peace."

Another son, Webb Thackeray, appointed to the Madras Civil Service in 1806, died almost immediately on landing in India, and a third, St. John, sent out to the Madras Civil Service in 1809, was killed, together with the nephew of Sir Thomas Monro, in a rural riot at Kittur in 1824. The Government despatch to the Court of Directors speaks of his death as a public calamity. A fourth son, Thomas, appointed an infantry cadet in 1803, became locally famous as an elephant hunter in Sylhet, but within eleven years of entering the Company's army was slain while gallantly covering the retreat of his regiment from a Gurkha stockade. "Justice to extraordinary valour," wrote the Marquess of Hastings as Commander-in-Chief,

"demands from the Commander-in-Chief the recorded expression of his unfeigned regret at the loss the service has sustained in the fall of Lieut. Thackeray."

Again, he writes as Governor-General in his despatch to the Court of Directors:—

"The heroic conduct of the Light Company, 2nd Battalion, under the command of Lieut. Thackeray, demands the peculiar and recorded tribute of the Governor-General's approbation and applause. His Lordship deeply laments the untimely fate of Lieut. Thackeray and the brave officers and men who perished with him in the performance of the most heroic acts of devotion to the cause in which they were engaged."

Sir William Hunter adds:—

"I have said that the Calcutta graveyards are strewn so thick with heroes as to leave small space for separate monuments. So each frontier of British India is traced out with tombstones of our gallant dead, for whom there was no time to write epitaphs. The sole memorial of Lieut. Thomas Thackeray on the heights of Jeytuck is the mention of his name on a slab to his brave ensign, Wilson, who died with him."

Charles, the youngest son of William Makepeace Thackeray, went out to India as a barrister, and when the versatile Stocqueler, whose biography ought to be written by some one, bought the John Bull of Calcutta, and turned it into the Englishman, Charles Thackeray and John Farley Leith, one of the most distinguished members of the Indian bar, became the chief contributors to its columns. Macaulay, who was the first to insist on the freedom of the press in India, which, or the English section of it, had been regularly established only fifteen years before by James Silk Buckingham in 1820, also contributed to the Englishman, and one of the papers he sent to it was his review of the 'History of the Earl of Chatham,' by the Rev. Francis Thackeray, one of the sons of William Makepeace who did not go to India. Richmond, his second son, born in 1781, was appointed to the Bengal Civil Service in 1798, and married the beautiful Anne Becher in 1810, leaving her a widow in 1815, with an only child, the future novelist, just four years old. She found a home among her relatives in India, and later married Capt. Carmichael Smyth; but the mother's influence remained with her son to the last days of his life. He left Calcutta in 1817, when six years old, and forty-four years afterwards, in one of his 'Roundabout Papers,' refers to his parting from her,

"remembering in long distant days such a ghat or river-stair at Calcutta; and a day when down those steps, to a boat which was in waiting, came two children whose mothers remained on shore."

The two children were Thackeray and his cousin Sir Richmond Shakespear. It is a typical scene from the life of the English in India, and there are few Anglo-Indians who have not acted both parts in it—of the child parting from parents, and again, in after years, of the parent parting from children.

Sir Richmond Shakespear was the son of the brilliant Bengal civilian who married Emily Thackeray. Her sister Augusta married another Bengal civilian, Mr. Elliot. Two of Thackeray's grand-aunts also married in India: Henrietta to Mr. James Harris of the Bengal Civil Service, and Jane to Major James Rennell, the famous engineer, famous also as a geographer and Surveyor-General of Bengal.

Sir William Hunter is as happy in his broad, but careful treatment of the events in which the Indian Thackerays lived and moved as in the accurate and detailed way in which he has traced out their individual lives. But we have already reached the limits of the space at our command, and it is in the pedigree of the greatest novelist of the past and passing generation of Englishmen that our readers will be most interested. We will, therefore, only add that Sir William Hunter has never done better literary work than in the present volume, which is based on a magazine article. It is a notable family he has brought before his readers, the members of which, the women as well as the men, by their character and reputation all influenced for good, and more or less determined the destiny of, the most illustrious representative of their stock; and it is to Sir William's praise that he has proved himself an historian worthy of them.

The Queen's Cup. By G. A. Henty. 3 vols. (Chatto & Windus.)

This is a good old-fashioned story of an out-of-doors sort, and reads easily and well. The soldier hero goes through the Indian Mutiny and a long yachting cruise to Hayti in pursuit of his Bertha, who is carried off in a schooner by his rival Carthew, a villain of the blackest piratical dye. The scenes of action have plenty of go, but the little love-making there is does not satisfy. It is difficult to admire Bertha Greendale as a model of her sex when she addresses the man she has once refused with the strong hint, "Frank, are you never going to give me a chance again?"

The Backslider: a Story of To-day. By Constance Smith. 2 vols. (Bentley & Son.)

In 'The Backslider: a Story of To-day,' actuality and freshness have been accidentally omitted, or we fail to recognize them. The attempt to modernize the tone of the material has been unsuccessful; the matter and manner are decidedly hackneyed, and anything but "the latest seed of time." Miss Smith takes her situation, such as it is, with intense seriousness. Yet the word "serious" scarcely hits off the aspect and condition of the atmosphere and those who move in it. "Anguish" best describes the feelings of her people. The cause of it is simply a lady who before her marriage held some advanced "views" and even convictions in regard to religion and morals! To-day, when every schoolroom girl is allowed to babble, not so much of green fields as of life and her opinions on its processes, surely the ideas of a full-grown woman need call for no such fuss. If the lady, her friends, and likewise her foes had only kept quiet, or, at any rate, adopted a modicum of the least-said-soonest-mended attitude instead of the mood of much ado about nothing, all would in time have gone well. Certainly these two volumes would not have been written, but, as somebody says somewhere, "then also well." The portentous mode of dealing with the "case," the high-falutin' and feeble villainy of the people in the story, argue in the author a fearsome deficiency of humour and knowledge of the world and its ways. Miss Smith's observation and her utterances generally are not in focus with the present lines of thought, manner, and action. An occasional slip in the grammar of her own and the French language does nothing to improve her diction and expression.

There is a good deal of waiting and some uncertainty to get through in the course of these two volumes. They are about a son who was lost, sorrowed for, and not found for about the space of sixteen years. When at the age of twenty he does turn up, complications and mistakes about somebody else's son ensue. The youth's identity and the position generally are not finally cleared up till very near the end. Parental instinct as an efficient aid to the identification of lost offspring has often been questioned by non-sentimentalists. Fortunately the feelings—always dangerous guides—are not often put to the test. That the father and mother of the lad who was kidnapped away from them at the age of four should not have picked him out instead of the labourer's son seems a little strange. The plot is slightly far-fetched and motiveless, but the personality of the lost son is rather interesting and attractive, though not quite convincing. As the plot of the child stolen in infancy was not exactly invented yesterday, the book is much less stale than might have been expected.

Cynthia: a Daughter of the Philistines. By Leonard Merrick. 2 vols. (Chatto & Windus.)

The well-disposed reader of 'Cynthia' may discover a good many amusing things in her story. The book is a thought unequal, the characters are not quite consistent in development, the changes of locality are not productive of any great gain as regards effect, but in spite of flaws there is vigour and freshness in much of it. The atmosphere is distinctly middle-class and is well sustained. The hero, Humphrey Kent, a clever young novelist, just beginning "to get his name up," is an interesting and rather attractive personality. The author is gifted with some sense of humour, and his way of presenting the youth's intercourse with utterly unliterary relatives-in-law and the Streatham environment generally is funny and apparently lifelike. Mr. Merrick steers his course carefully through the perils of caricature, and keeps most of his characters on human enough lines. Kent, on a holiday expedition to Dieppe with his friend Turquand, meets his future wife and mother-in-law. We prefer them in the bosom of their family in their suburban retreat, where they are to the manner born. The pair improve on acquaintance, and before the end of the story it is possible to have something approaching a real liking for Cynthia and an amused tolerance for her mother. The kindly, but somewhat blatant contempt of the good stockbroking father for the profession of literature, his entire ignorance of it as an art, and his complacency in that ignorance are finely drawn. A cynical maiden aunt, a somewhat preposterous brother, and Turquand, one of the minor literati and the friend of Kent in adversity and the reverse, form an amusing gallery of portraits.

The Career of Candida. By George Paston. (Chapman & Hall.)

In novels by men the "new woman" (for once the abominable expression must serve) is generally used as a target for ridicule. 'The Career of Candida' is not conducted quite on these lines, though the heroine does hold advanced views, and even puts them into practice. We were prepared to be a good deal bored by her forced unconventionality and heterodox ideas, and at first the expectation seemed likely to be fulfilled. As Candida's career developes, however, the reader discovers that hers is rather a fine, robust, and entirely simple nature; she is, in fact, a real woman with no nonsense about her, and not an incarnation of tiresome or displeasing abstractions. In spite of her opinions she is quite unable to lay aside her natural impulse towards unselfish, unreasoning devotion, even in the case of an undeserving specimen of the despised sex. Nothing is much truer than that "on a beau chasser la nature, le naturel revient toujours." So it is with Candida and, in another fashion, with her friend Sabina.

A Man of Honour. By H. C. Irwin. (Black.)

The historical movement in fiction—in essence a reaction against introspection—continues merrily. At such a juncture the days of the Indian Mutiny are naturally brought to the front again, notably in Mrs. Steel's recent novel. 'A Man of Honour,' by Mr. Irwin, tells of the annexation of the Punjaub, the clearing out of the rebels, and less directly of the massacre itself. It is not one of the "marking" stories of its class, but it is not without interest, and bears manifest signs of conscientious and somewhat laboured research. There are several little maps supposed to have been enclosed in the home letters of the hero. Being disappointed in love, he in the year 1848 betakes himself to India and soldiering. The result is his death in action, and, for the reader, a good deal of general information on the whole aspect and position of the "Company" and the condition of Indian politics. It can hardly be called a vivid picture of persons and places, real or imaginary; for it drags in places, and there is not much thrill to be got even out of the Mutiny chronicles of Cawnpore. The people of the story do not greatly interest one, and yet the volume is in many respects commendable.

Of the Deepest Dye. By Col. Cuthbert Larking. (Hurst & Blackett.)

This story is one of incident rather than of searching analysis of character. It is possible to imagine a villain several shades deeper in hue than Capt. Laidlaw, but let him pass. He possesses many of the necessary characteristics for the part assigned him. He is a gambler, forger, burglar, and a would-be murderer and betrayer alike of friend and foe. Yet one does not seem to take him or anything else in the story too seriously. His one redeeming quality is his affection for horses. There is a good deal of careering about between South Africa and London, and much running of people to earth, and so forth. There are, so far as we remember, two marriages of the orthodox happy-ever-after kind. The author is not a master of language, whatever else he may be.

Sidartha: a Story of Mystery. By Kathleen Behenna. (Digby, Long & Co.)

The author of 'Sidartha' has not a glimmering as to the elements needed to shape a story and keep it together. Her attempt to tell one is perfectly chaotic and almost unintelligible, and as she defies every law of construction, and consequently of criticism, there is really nothing to be said. We may just add that the "mystery" is revealed with excessive crudity. As it happens to turn on an ugly fancy, there are people who will read the book. Those who do not care to be nauseated for nothing may avoid the sensation by leaving 'Sidartha' unvisited.

Without Faith or Fear. By J. E. Muddock. (Digby, Long & Co.)

From Mr. Muddock's title-page he appears to have written more than ten novels under his own name, and he is well known as the author of a good many more under a pseudonym pretty familiar to readers of detective stories. We imagine that he has his public, or publishers would not continue to produce his stories. This being so, it is a little hard to see why he, or his publisher, should care to have his works reviewed. A young writer starting in fiction who shows aptitude may be encouraged by criticism to proceed, with, perhaps, such modifications in pace, speed, or direction as may secure an earlier arrival at the goal of success. One who is without aptitude may be gently diverted into another field, where his talents may turn to better account. But we can hardly conceive of an old hand like Mr. Muddock accepting from a reviewer any suggestions for his improvement, or, indeed, being still sufficiently pliant to act upon them; still less being induced to abandon fiction, and take, let us say, to guide-books. We may content ourselves, therefore, by saying that the characters in his present work hardly seem to have been studied from life; that Ghibelline was not the name of an "historic family" in Italy, nor, for that matter, Guelph that of a "powerful and renowned" one—fancy a "Captain Tory" taking two foreigners in London to a gambling party in the former palace "of the once powerful and renowned Whig family"; that an Italian gentleman would hardly mention to a comparative stranger that his son's tutor, "a divinity student upon whom great hopes are set," was the grandson of a cardinal, by way of emphasizing his qualifications; and, lastly, if in this connexion one may refer to the point without irreverence, that Nazareth was not the birthplace of Christ. A large part of the business and scenery seems to have been introduced with the view of utilizing a recent trip to Palestine. On the whole, we do not counsel Mr. Muddock to divert his energies to the compilation of a guide-book to that country. Fiction is his forte, after all.

The Borderer. By Adam Lilburn. (Smith, Elder & Co.)

Mr. Lilburn may make a novelist some day, but he has a good deal to learn first. He can block out a story pretty well on pretty well-established lines. Two men are in love with the same girl, one attractive and profligate, the other steady but austere (that the two are brothers is a comparatively unusual variation and susceptible of rather unsavoury developments). The bad one makes the running, but is outpaced by the good one, not without a little suspicion of sharp practice on the part of the winner, leading to more remorse on his part than was, perhaps, called for; the usual vicissitudes of disappearances and reappearances follow; and the end is satisfactory. The influence of natural scenery on the emotions is also fairly well worked, though the author has not quite grasped the difference between description and enumeration. Yet somehow 'The Borderer' is heavy reading. Mr. Lilburn has not yet the art of giving his characters just that vivifying touch which makes the reader feel towards them and their concerns as towards the objects of his own personal interest, and keeps him reading till his usual bedtime is past and his fire has burnt low. In other words, Mr. Lilburn knows where he wants to go, but not how to get there. And—a small detail—he overdoes his "damns" terribly.

PATRISTIC LITERATURE.

S. Aurelii Augustini Hipponensis Episcopi Liber de Catechizandis Rudibus. Edited by the Rev. W. Yorke Fausset, M.A. (Methuen & Co.)—Mr. Fausset has not attempted a recension of Augustine's treatise. He takes little note of various readings. His text is "in the main that of Wolfhard." It is in the notes that the peculiarity of the edition lies. Mr. Fausset explains his object in writing these. He says:

"I have endeavoured to adapt the notes to the requirements of students who prefer the original to any translation, but wish to arrive at the sense by the shortest possible route. I have therefore endeavoured to leave no real difficulties of translation unsolved, and to illustrate the thought of S. Augustine from various sources."

Mr. Fausset has accomplished his aim. There is a liberal supply of translations of passages, some of them by no means difficult. The renderings are good and accurate. The notes on the subject-matter are interesting, and show a wide range of reading. The book is, in fact, a satisfactory school edition of the tractate.

In the series called "The Fathers for English Readers," the Society for Promoting Christian Knowledge has issued Boniface, by the Rev. I. Gregory Smith. Even the writer of a popular sketch may be expected to know something of the literature of his subject. Yet Mr. Smith, writing a book on St. Boniface, complains that the saint's letters were edited "inadequately" (which is perfectly true) by Dr. Giles, and is totally ignorant of the critical edition published by Jaffé in 1866. He spells Boniface's baptismal name "Winfried," as though he were a continental German; and he calls the monastery where he was professed "Nutsall," whereas (if we are to forsake the modern name of Nutshalling or Nursling) the form used by Willibald, the saint's biographer, is "Nhutscelle." St. Willibrord appears here as "Willibrod." St. Boniface's second visit to Rome is placed a year too late; he is said to have subscribed to "the oath usually taken by Italian bishops (suburbicani [sic])," whereas his oath contained a remarkable clause in substitution of the usual one; a little further on we are told that he was made archbishop "and Legate," for which latter statement there is no authority. Mr. Smith misses altogether the importance of the fact that St. Boniface's earlier labours in Germany during the principate of Charles Martel were chiefly in Bavaria, in a region where the Frank had little real power—in other words, that his supporter was not Charles, but Odilo of Bavaria. In the countries directly under Frankish sway Boniface only began to work with freedom after Charles's death. Equally little intelligence do we find of the character of the Irish missions with which Boniface came into conflict: "Aldebert, Clemens, and Godelsacius" are grouped together without a hint of the diverse tendencies they represented. Nor was it prudent of Mr. Smith to deviate from the history of the eighth century into questions of Roman controversy of more recent times, since his statements limiting the saint's dependence upon the Papacy are highly disputable. It was a pity also to fill out the volume (short as it is) by extracts from the author's book on 'Christian Monasticism,' which is full of errors and misconceptions. The passages chosen from St. Boniface's letters will, however, be read with interest, and Mr. Smith has rightly laid stress upon the saint's correspondence with English people—men and women—which displays the most sympathetic features of a remarkable and attractive character.

THE LIBRARIES OF FICTION.

Though undeniably clever, Man, by Miss Lilian Quiller Couch, published by Messrs. Dent in their "Odd Volumes Series," is an irritating book. There are passages in it—as, for example, the battle scene in 'The Courage of a Man'—which show that the author has a fine imagination, and can express her ideas in clear-cut, nervous English; but the stories lose much of their hold on the reader by their impersonal setting, and the iteration of the phrases beginning "the man" and "the girl" becomes wearisome beyond words. The dialogue is less successful than the description—a common failing with literary novices. They can paint you a tolerable landscape, but when the figures are filled in, the picture somehow lacks vitality and vraisemblance. 'The Method of a Man' may be cited as an instance of what we mean. In the hands of Anthony Hope such a tête-à-tête as this would palpitate and sparkle with actuality; but the encounter of "the man" and "the girl" is clumsy and unconvincing, though we are free to admit that the dénoûment, when reached, is amusing enough. 'The Intention of a Man' is merely an elaborate ineptitude; but 'The Consistency of a Man' is genuinely humorous, and the diary recording the courtship of its "Miss C." is almost worthy of Addison himself.

My Brother, by Mr. Vincent Brown, in "Pierrot's Library" (Lane), is a curious tale, which by turns delights and annoys its reader. The character of the half-witted but warm-hearted "Prophet," Paul Penfold, is cleverly drawn, and the sacrifice he makes, unavailing as it is, to save his "brother's" life, by accepting the responsibility for Lord Lusson's murder, is movingly described. Yet the narrative drags terribly at times, and is clogged by some of the most wearisome dialogue it has ever been our lot to plough through. Mr. Brown has a very imperfect sense of humour, and his specimens of rustic wit are appallingly heavy; but when all is said and done, his book is not without a certain power of its own, and here and there (notably in the chapters dealing with the flight of the murderer) it rises to a really high level.

The people in Which is Absurd, by Cosmo Hamilton, published in Mr. Fisher Unwin's "Autonym Library," have "lovely deep Astrakan" voices and "Kharkee-coloured" or "oblong" eyes. They employ, when addressing each other, not only "sentimental grossities," but "melodramatic farfetchidoms." When they are not swearing, they are usually drinking brandy. Men and women alike, they are (with the single exception of Manners) the most vulgar as well as the most brainless set of idiots we have lately come across in fiction. Mr. Kipling has been charged with being hard upon Anglo-Indian society, but his Capt. Gadsbys and his Mrs. Hawksbees, however improper, were at least amusing.

SCOTTISH STORIES.

A plot which involves the death of the heroine, an Edinburgh barmaid whose antecedents are creditable to her virtue if not to her worldly wisdom, and the slaughter of the rascally husband who deserted her in America, besides the development of the vacillating and rather infantile Claude Garton into a man of mettle through the influence of his virtuous attachment, would seem a sufficient basis for a novel. But in Claude Garton, by Mr. T. J. Henry (Glasgow, Livingston), the fortunes of the hero only meander thinly through the great mass of medical gossip, trucidations coram populo in the dissecting room, anecdotes of medical students and professors in the university of "Dunburgh" (why this shrinking modesty on the part of the F.R.C.S.E.?), and such topics as "The Rectorial Election," "A Students' Symposium," "A Glimpse of Practice," and "The Mysteries of Quackery." It is in fact a very copious monograph on the life of an Edinburgh student and his circle to its uttermost bounds, plus a number of sketches of more or less prominent worthies among the dons of that learned society. It will deserve a welcome among the initiated, in spite of a good deal of prolixity and some defects of the tribe in the matter of style; but its humour is rather too ponderous for the general public.

The Bloom of Faded Years, by Mr. Walmer Downe (Glasgow, McKelvie & Co.), is a very thin and straggling specimen of Scotch kail. The lodging-house keeper in Leith Walk, mother of the leading lady, uses broad and rather vulgar Scotch, and her daughter the governess talks like a book or rather a feuilleton. But journalese is the language of nearly all the interlocutors, and, we must add, of the writer himself. Dr. Gordon, the first young man, thus converses with the lady of his second choice:—

"'Will you be going out again to-night, Doctor?' 'The answer to that question rests entirely with yourself, Miss Murray.' 'Dear me, you are enigmatical; won't you descend to plain speaking in order that I may stand some chance of comprehending you?' 'I shall endeavour to do so with the greatest of pleasure by making a request. Provided you give the reply which I covet, my stethoscope shall be laid aside, and I remain where I am; but if you refuse, you will entail upon my susceptible nature a pang of disappointment which no anæsthetic possesses power to allay.' 'Really, Dr. Gordon, that statement places too great a tax on my credulity. May I request you to modify it?' 'Oh! ho!! Is this your answer?' And Henry shoved his chair back as he continued: 'You are not exactly a bread and butter school miss, I see. Are you accustomed to dealing with intended compliments in this fashion?' 'I have never been afflicted with any before. But why do you talk in such a manner?'"

Echo repeats the question. Apart from the exuberant verbosity of the dialogue and occasional slips of spelling, there is nothing to distinguish this extremely commonplace story of many uninteresting people except the illustrations (among them photographic views of Edinburgh and some homely portraits) and the quotation of some of the commonest of Scotch ballads. Lady Nairne's well-known 'Auld House' sustains a double indignity: the Jacobite verses are omitted from the text, and for the "House of Gask" the artist presents us with "a but and a ben."

OUR LIBRARY TABLE.

Bells and Pomegranates, First Series, by Robert Browning, one of Messrs. Ward, Lock & Co.'s "Nineteenth Century Classics," is one of the best of the many editions of the poems now out of copyright. The print is very good, the text interesting as that of the first edition, and the editor, Mr. T. J. Wise, a well-known authority, contributes notes and a useful list of subsidia for study.—Poems by Robert Browning, with introduction by Oscar Browning (Routledge), is not so satisfactory. The introduction is too long, and says rather too much about the writer of it. It is inadequate, in view of Browning's own letter on the subject, to say that the 'Lost Leader' was aimed at Wordsworth. The hero of 'Waring' should be spelt Domett (p. xx), and "Cristine" (p. xxi) should be Cristina.

Messrs. Chapman & Hall have issued a new edition of that most useful handbook The Dickens Dictionary of Mr. Pierce and Mr. Wheeler, a key to the characters and incidents of the novels which we have frequently found of the greatest service.

Messrs. Ward & Downey are issuing a collection of prose writings by Mr. John Davidson, of which the second volume, entitled Baptist Lake, is before us. We reviewed the story in March, 1894.

Of the tasteful edition of Marryat's novels which Mr. Brimley Johnson is editing and Messrs. Dent & Co. are publishing, the fifteenth and sixteenth volumes are before us. They contain Monsieur Violet and The Privateersman. Mr. Johnson's short prefaces supply the reader with all necessary information and some sound criticism. Mr. Symington's etchings in the former volume are decidedly clever.

In "The Temple Classics" Messrs. Dent & Co. have issued neat reprints of The Essays of Elia and The Last Essays of Elia, The Religio Medici and Urn Burial, and Gulliver's Travels. The text of the last-named has been revised by Mr. Aitken, who has added marginalia and an interesting "note" on the book. He has also furnished explanations of the chief allusions.—Mr. Brimley Johnson has brought out a judicious selection of Pen Portraits by Thomas Carlyle (G. Allen).

Messrs. Sampson Low & Co. have sent us a handsomely illustrated edition of Hans Brinker, by Mary Mapes Dodge. The cuts are excellent.

Lodge's handsome Peerage and Baronetage has reached us from Messrs. Hurst & Blackett, a clearly printed and well arranged volume of established reputation.

We have on our table Historical Sketch of Armenia and the Armenians in Ancient and Modern Times, by an Old Indian (Stock),—The Hindu at Home, being Sketches of Hindu Daily Life, by the Rev. J. E. Padfield (Simpkin),—The Watch-Song of Heabane the Witness (Murray),—A Directory of Science, Art, and Technical Schools, by R. S. Lineham (Chapman & Hall),—The Universal Directory of Railway Officials, 1896, by S. R. Blundstone (8, Catherine Street, W.C.),—Geometrical Drawing, Second Part, by W. N. Wilson (Longmans),—International Bimetallism, by F. A. Walker (Macmillan),—The Tutorial Chemistry: Part I. Non-Metals, by G. H. Bailey, edited by W. Briggs (Clive),—The Testimony of Science to the Deluge, by W. B. Galloway (Low),—A Wonderful House and its Tenants, by Five Members of a Working Men's Club (Skeffington),—A Market for an Impulse, by W. W. Tufts (Boston, U.S., Arena Publishing Company),—Gorillas and Chimpanzees, by R. L. Garner (Osgood),—Juvenile Offenders, by W. D. Morrison (Fisher Unwin),—Cane Basket Work, illustrated, by A. Firth (Gill),—Chums, 1896 (Cassell),—Young England, Vol. XVII. (S.S.U.),—Stories for Men and Women, by Frances W. Saunders, Series I. (Sonnenschein),—and Religious Faith, by the Rev. H. Hughes (Kegan Paul). Among New Editions we have The Anglo-American Annual, 1896-7 (Stanford),—and A History of the Protestant Reformation in England and Ireland, by W. Cobbett, revised by F. A. Gasquet, D.D. (Art and Book Company).

PROF. MASPERO'S 'STRUGGLE OF THE NATIONS.'

THE letter of Verax in your last issue amazes me. There is not a word of apology for the three wrong assumptions which he made in his previous communication.

1. He still makes the S.P.C.K. guilty of "this piece of literary bad faith" after he has learnt that there was no bad faith in the matter, and that the Society had no part in any modification which, with the author's consent, was made in the diction of the original.

2. He still thinks that the charge of "surreptitiously tampering" with the original text is sustainable "from an English public point of view," although the modifications in question were made with the consent of Prof. Maspero, and are not in real contradiction with his views. There are in other parts of the English edition extensions and modifications of the original text, made, in conjunction with Prof. Maspero, during the course of the translation, owing to further discoveries. Are these "from an English public point of view" "surreptitious tamperings with the text"?

3. He still maintains that the few modifications he notices are of sufficient importance to warrant his statement that Prof. Maspero—who, in a work published over ten years ago in its last edition, and some twenty years ago in its first edition, had explicitly "adopted the historical conclusions of Reuss and Wellhausen"—had now been made to "appear throughout as an orthodox traditionalist." I may safely leave all fair minds to judge of this assumption from a careful examination of the passages cited by Verax. To test his assumption on the most important point, I add the second series of citations and translations upon which he bases his charge that while in Prof. Maspero's view the narratives of Genesis were composed under the monarchy, in the translation something else is stated :—

2. "For Wellhausen's theory of the probable date of this episode [Gen. xxvii.], cf. Wellhausen"—P. 66, n. 4.

"The episode of Othniel and Chushan-rishathaim..... is by many critics rejected as spurious."—P. 685, n. 2.

"For Stade's view as to the later development of Judah, see....."—P. 702, n. 1.

"Budde.....endeavours to show that these events were attributed at a later date to Joshua."—P. 703, n. 2.

"Some critics think....."—P. 712.

"1 Sam. xxiv. thought by some writers to have been of much later date."—P. 717, n. 3.

"Sur l'âge probable de cette tradition, cf. Wellhausen....."

"..... repose, de l'aveu général, sur une tradition sans valeur."

"Sur la formation de Judah, et sur l'époque tardive à laquelle il se constitua définitivement sous son apparence historique, cf. Stade....."

"Sur ces faits, qui ont été attribués plus tard à la conquête de Josué, cf. Budde....."

"La tradition lui attribua plus tard....."

"1 Sam. xxiv., légende populaire dont la rédaction définitive est d'assez basse époque."

Any unprejudiced reader of the text and translation of these passages will see, I think, that Wellhausen's, Stade's, Budde's, and other critics' opinions are the base of both, and that there is no contradiction between the substance of the translation and the statements in the French text.

The fact seems to be clear that Verax, knowing the opinions expressed in Prof. Maspero's early volume on the ancient history of the East (published, I think, in 1878), was prepared to startle the world by proving (1) either that the venerable S.P.C.K. had accepted the views of the higher critics in regard to the Old Testament, or (2) that in the process of translation the Society had "surreptitiously tampered" with the text, making Prof. Maspero an "orthodox traditionalist." He must have been grievously disappointed when, with this view in his mind, he examined the English translation; still he thought that there was enough to warrant his assumption that there was surreptitious tampering, and hence this "storm in a teacup."

It may surprise him to learn that few, if any critics, Prof. Maspero included, now accept fully the "conclusions of Reuss and Wellhausen." There is no finality about such views. Here are Prof. Maspero's own words: "Je crois aussi qu'une réaction est utile contre l'abus qui a été fait de la critique du texte dans ce dernier temps, et, pour mon compte, j'ai cru ne devoir tenir que d'une partie des résultats auxquels elle arrive."

The public now know all the facts connected with the assumptions of Verax, and may be safely left to draw their own conclusions. Both author and translator will doubtless feel that they ought to have foreseen the requirements of his code of literary ethics, and not have dared to jointly alter anything, whether representing views of ten or twenty years ago or not, without advertising the fact beforehand.

EDMUND MCCLURE.

COUNT BESTUZHEV-RYUMIN.

IN Count Bestuzhev-Ryumin, whose death was recorded last week, Russia has lost one of her most scholarly and conscientious historians.

Konstantin Nikolaevich Bestuzhev-Ryumin, the scion of an ancient and illustrious family, in which rare political and diplomatic talent has been hereditary for generations, was born in 1829 at Kudreshkaya, in the government of Nizhny-Novgorod, and was educated at the local gymnasium and at the University of Moscow. From his earliest years he displayed a great fondness for historical studies. His father possessed a fine library, and there the lad passed most of his time, greedily devouring everything he could lay his hands upon. Plutarch and Karamzin were his especial favourites. At Moscow he diligently attended the lectures of such men as Solovev, Pogodin, Ryedkin, and Buslaev, and on completing his university course continued to reside at Moscow (1856 to 1859) as instructor of the Corps of Cadets, and assistant editor of the Moskovskaya Vyedomosti. At the end of 1859 he moved to St. Petersburg, and became one of the contributors to the Otechesky Zapiski, where most of his earlier articles first appeared, among which may be mentioned 'Slavyonophil'skoe uchenie i ego sud'bui v Russkoi Literaturye' ('Slavophil Teaching and its Fate in Russian History')—the first comprehensive and perfectly dispassionate critical exposition of Slavophilism. About the same time he helped to translate Buckle's 'History of Civilization in England' into Russian. In 1864 he became the editor of the Zapiski of the Geographical Society, and a member of the Archæological Commission. In 1865 he occupied the Chair of Russian History in the University of St. Petersburg, and three years later received the honorary degree of Doctor for his masterly dissertation 'O Sostanye Russkich Lyetopisei do kontsa XIV. vyeka' ('On the Composition of the Russian Chronicles to the End of the Fourteenth Century'). In 1872 appeared the first part of his maximum opus, the 'History of Russia,' which was immediately translated into German. A second part, carrying the history of the country down to the death of Ivan the Terrible, came out thirteen years later, but the work was then laid aside and never completed. Even as it stands, however, the 'Russkaya Istoria' is a permanent contribution to historical literature. Every page of it is marked by wide and deep research, critical acumen, and above all by absolute impartiality. Bestuzhev is one of the most objective of historians. He had a perfect horror of purely subjective philosophical theories, which he rightly regarded as unscientific. He was faithful to facts, and to facts alone, and he always began by submitting his documents to the most searching scrutiny. He was, indeed, one of the most thoroughgoing adherents of the modern historical school, and the bibliographical portions of his great work supply rich materials for future scholars to work upon. He was, moreover, as modest as he was learned, and always very chary of dogmatizing. It is a matter of regret, perhaps, that this eminent investigator should have given so much of his time to editorial and journalistic work, but it is to be hoped that his numerous scattered essays and dissertations will be collected and published in book form. He himself set the example in this respect by republishing some of his articles, fifteen years ago, in a volume entitled 'Biography i Kharakteristiki.' In 1882 Bestuzhev was prostrated by a severe illness, and sent to Italy for two years to recover his health. In 1890 he was made a member of the Imperial Academy. His death leaves a gap which it will not be easy to fill up.

R. NISBET BAIN.

HILARY, BISHOP OF CHICHESTER.

IN a recent communication to the Athenæum (October 31st, 1896, p. 601) I dealt with the great Robert Pullen, well known for his learning in Rome, as in England, under Stephen, and especially with the difficulties raised by his employment at Rome. I shall now deal with one who was his contemporary at Rome, his career in the English Church (though the fact has been strangely overlooked) having been broken for a time by employment at the Papal Court.

The life of Hilary, Bishop of Chichester, in the 'Dictionary of National Biography,' begins with the statement that he "was nominated to the bishopric in 1146 ('Chr. Petrob.'), and consecrated by Archbishop Theobald at Canterbury 3 Aug., 1147." The 'Peterborough Chronicle,' doubtless here cited through Le Neve's 'Fasti,' is a late authority of no independent value whatever for the period, and its statement that Hilary was "made bishop" in 1146 is, we shall see, a mere blunder, as indeed is suggested by its placing the event after the Council of Rheims (March, 1148). Nor does the writer seem to have known anything of Hilary's previous career. Now we have two separate authorities, confirmed independently by a third, for the fact that he had held an eminent position at the Papal Court, while from one of them we learn that he had previously been Dean of Christchurch (Twynham), Hants, then a college of secular canons. John of Hexham thus describes him at the time of his consecration as Bishop of Chichester :—

"Qui Hylarius in ministerio Henrici Wintoniæ episcopi plurimum gloriæ pretium emeruit. Postea ad ministerium Apostolici translatus in reddendis et prosequendis causis advocatus disertissimus et jurisconsultus peritus in curia Romana fuit."—'Sym. Dun.,' ii 321.

The Twynham Register (Cotton MS. Tib. D. vi.) thus describes his tenure of the house :—

"Successit Hillarius Wyntoniensis episcopi clericus, vitæ humilitatisque honestate præclarus, qui etiam præfatam in melius transferre cupiens, superna providentiæ gratia Romam ductus, et domini papæ electione apud Cicestriam pontificali decoratus infula,* in racionis discretionem omnia proposuit futura."—Folio 193d.

A charter of confirmation by Baldwin de Redvers is addressed to him as "Hyllario decano" ('Mon. Ang.,' vi. 304), so that he must have held the office before Baldwin became an earl (which seems to have been in 1140-1141). I also find him, as "Dean of Christchurch," attesting a charter of the Bishop of Winchester which must belong to 1139-1142. If a charter printed in the 'Monasticon' (vi. 305) can be trusted, he continued (as a pluralist) to hold the post so late as 1150, when he joined his former master, Henry, Bishop of Winchester, in transforming the college into a priory for canons regular.

The third authority which refers to his position at the Court of Rome is the 'Battle Abbey Chronicle,' which describes him at his accession (1147) as

"viro magnifico Hilario, qui Romanæ curiæ notitiam ac favorem plurimum obtinuerat."†

Again, it makes him assure the king, ten years later, that

"ego autem in curia illa omnibus notus sum, et cujus honestatis vel moralitatis sim omnibus ibidem commanentibus haud incognitum est."—P. 102.

It is clear, therefore, that Hilary was at Rome at the same time as Robert Pullen, although he is not mentioned among the "Englishmen in Italy" in Dr. Stubbs's 'Lectures on Mediæval and Modern History' (p. 132). It is further clear, at least to me, that it was the Pope himself who made him Bishop of Chichester. Apart from the "papæ electione" of the Twynham register, John of Hexham distinctly states :—

"Hylarius vero ex Apostolici præcepto jam fuit consecratus episcopus ecclesiæ Cicestriæ."—'Sym. Dun.,' ii. 321.

The whole account of Hilary's career for 1146-8 is most confused in the 'Dictionary of National Biography.' On July 24th, 1147, Hilary, then described as "clericus Apostolici," was elected to the vacant see of York by a portion of the chapter, the rest selecting Henry Murdac.‡ The dispute was referred to the Pope, who had evidently already selected Hilary for Chichester, as he was consecrated its bishop, "by the Pope's direction," only ten days later. The interest of this conclusion lies in its bearing on what is termed by Dr. Stubbs a question of "great importance,"§ namely, the "interference of the Popes in episcopal appointments."‖ It seems to me that the case of Hilary should clearly be added to those he enumerates as occurring under Stephen.¶

Hilary seems to have joined the king's party (perhaps through the influence of the Bishop of Winchester), for, according to the 'Historia Pontificalis,' he was one of the three bishops sent to the Pope, early in 1148, to "excuse" the absence of the English primate and bishops from the Council of Rheims. It was on this occasion, or after Theobald's forfeiture, that Hilary, "excusing King Stephen to the Pope," received the sharp rebuke: "We thought we had created [in] thee a son of the Church of Rome; but we have created in thee an arrow and a sword."* He gave further offence to the Pope the same year (1148) when called upon, with two other bishops, to join Theobald at St. Omer in consecrating Gilbert Foliot Bishop of Hereford.† This they declined to do on high constitutional grounds, their appeal to the "antiquas consuetudines regni" curiously anticipating the Constitutions of Clarendon (1166).

The great interest attaching to the growth, at this period, of canon law and its increasing influence in England, gives importance to the fact that Hilary (a protégé of its patron Eugene III.) was a canonist. This, which is implied in the passage quoted from John of Hexham above, is certain from the style "Magister" applied to him on the previous page,‡ and accounts for that extreme form of pseudo-Isidorian doctrine by which he proved himself indeed a "son of the Church of Rome," but evoked from Henry II. that sudden explosion of wrath in the chapter-house at Colchester (1157).§

I need not discuss the part he took in the Becket controversy and the missions connected with it, for that is already familiar. But it is worth noting (as it seems to have escaped notice) that we may detect him in a "Magister Hilarius" who is mentioned, with bishops and abbots, among the assessors of the Papal legate Hicmar (the Cardinal Imarus) in a case between the Bishop of Rochester and his monks, heard in London about the beginning (I think) of 1145.‖ Hicmar has been represented as merely a Papal envoy sent to bring the pall to William, Archbishop of York. But from documents in Thorpe's 'Registrum Roffense' (p. 41) we learn that on his arrival the monks of Rochester appealed to him, as Papal legate, for redress against Ascelin their bishop. He thereupon summoned both parties to appear before him in London, and in virtue of his legatine authority ("auctoritate officii quo fungimur"), as he expressed it, decided the dispute in favour of the monks. Among his assessors were the great rivals Archbishop Theobald and the Bishop of Winchester, with the Bishops of Lincoln, Norwich, and Chichester; the Abbots of St. Albans, Westminster, Sherborne, Reading, and Ramsey; and the Priors of Bermondsey and Lewes. This remarkable assemblage would seem to have been overlooked. It proves, surely, that Cardinal Hicmar exercised true legatine functions, and that his mission therefore should be added to those enumerated by the Bishop of Oxford.¶

'DUMFRIES AND GALLOWAY.'

Monreith, January 16, 1897.

As the writer of your review of my book on 'Dumfries and Galloway' has distinctly impugned my good faith, will you have the courtesy to permit me a brief rejoinder? In the following paragraph he takes exception to my account of the murder of the Laird of Johnstone by Lord Maxwell :—

"He says no punishment followed on Lord Maxwell's burning of Dalfibble. It was one of the two charges on which he was beheaded. The other was the murder of Sir James Johnstone in 1608.....The late Mr. William McDowall.....somehow overlooked the exact scene of that famous assassination.....Sir William Fraser, writing after Mr. McDowall, has the same oversight. Sir Herbert—really copying, though professedly quoting original authority—of course follows."

The imputation in the words I have italicized is not only discreditable, but it is absolutely groundless. Of course I am familiar with Sir William Fraser's duplicate account of the transaction, and with Mr. McDowall's also, but I drew my narrative from the original record of Lord Maxwell's trial (Pitcairn's 'Criminal Trials,' vol. iii. pp. 28-53), no doubt the same source consulted by both these authors. Had your reviewer examined this record he would have found the reason why all of us have refrained from indicating the exact spot of the crime—namely, the discrepancy in the evidence on this point. In the "dittay" against the prisoner it is alleged that the murder was committed "ad moram inter Arthurstane et Trailflat." Sir Robert Maxwell of Spottis (an eye-witness) deponed that it took place "beyond the house of Beal"; William Johnstone of Lockerbie (another eye-witness) specifies a spot near "Cowart-croce"; and lastly, in the MS. 'History of Scotland' (Advocates' Library) it is stated that "thay mett on the hill besyde the place of Ellischeillis." As for Lord Maxwell's impunity for the burning of Dalfibble, it is true that it formed one of the three (not two, as your reviewer states) counts in the charge against him; but seeing that it was committed in February, 1602, and that Maxwell was not put on his trial till June 24th, 1609, after his slaughter of Sir James Johnstone, perhaps I am not in error in saying that it was committed with practical impunity.

In his anxiety to condemn my very imperfect work your reviewer has committed himself to some extraordinary statements. I will ask leave to advert to only two of them.

1. "The Scottish hostages of Edward I. in 1297 did not die in Lochmaben Castle.....they died in Carlisle." Here my critic has fallen into a singular trap. The story of the hostages appears in the account rendered to the King by the Bishop of Carlisle as Keeper of Carlisle Castle. It is printed in Raine's 'Letters from the Northern Registers,' pp. 154-157, and contains an account of wages and munitions sent "ad castrum de Loghmaban," including allowances for all the hostages, who are mentioned by name. But the marginal title runs as follows: "Monies paid to eleven hostages from Galloway in 1297-9; all of whom, save one, died at Carlisle." If my critic had read the Latin text instead of the English side-title, he would have detected the blunder, and spared me. For "Carlisle" Lochmaben should have been printed, which castle was at that time under the Bishop as Keeper of Carlisle.

2. "It is too evident that the omissions are explained by a harder word than 'forgetfulness.' For instance, it is stated that Kirkcudbright..... first became a royal burgh in 1455. It was a royal burgh under David II." I challenge your reviewer to make good that assertion. Kirkcudbright was a burgh of regality under the Douglas, until a charter was granted at Perth on the 26th of October, 1455, erecting it into a royal burgh. Is it possible that my critic has not learnt the difference between a burgh of regality and a royal burgh?

I forbear to notice several other points in the article, being unwilling to transgress further on your space, but several of them might be shown to involve a departure from the facts of history not less striking than those I have cited.

Herbert Maxwell.

 We are sorry to have been led into the error of supposing that Sir Herbert's description of Sir James Johnstone's murder on pp. 217-219 of his book (beginning with "On" and ending with "together") was copied with a little paraphrasing from the description of it in the 'Book of Carlaverock,' vol. i. pp. 311-313 (beginning with "On" and ending with "together"). The coincidences seemed to us to make the thing indisputable; and, curiously enough, in his present letter Sir Herbert quotes Sir William Fraser when saying that he is quoting Pitcairn, for the phrase "beyond the house of Beal" is Sir William's; the actual words of the deposition in Pitcairn are "beyond the House of the Beal." We do not even now understand why Sir Herbert—independently, he assures us, although Sir William had done it before him—selected this unidentified name to indicate a spot of which he did not know the whereabouts. There is really no discrepancy of evidence at all. The Ordnance Survey shows that Auchnane and Trailflat and Elshieshields are all within a narrow radius of the Murder Loch. They are all close to the moorland hill on the slope of which most probably some bield-house or place of shelter gave name to the House of the Beal, near which the fatal interview began. Now for the corrections. It is Sir Herbert who has fallen into the trap. The editorial note in the 'Letters' was perfectly right. The words eodem castro in the account referred to are distinguished from the reference to Lochmaben immediately above them. Mr. Bain's conclusion ('Calendar,' ii. 1179) that they denote the castle of Carlisle, as they do a few lines higher up the page, is demonstrated to be sound by a warrant for a further payment expressly saying that the hostages were at Carlisle (Bain's 'Cal.,' ii. 1300). To pass to Kirkcudbright. The ultimate criterion of a royal burgh as distinguished from a burgh of regality is the payment of burghal ferme to the Crown by provosts (prepositi), and this may be accompanied by the holding of chamberlain eyres in the town. The Exchequer Rolls, vol. i. pp. 303, 356, 357, show that in Kirkcudbright in 1330 and 1331 all these determinant characteristics existed.

Literary Gossip.

The legal representatives of Lord Byron and Lady Byron, from family reasons, acting in concert, desire to make it known that they have decided to exercise their rights of controlling the publication of all letters and documents to which those rights extend. They therefore give notice that they will take such legal steps as may be necessary to prevent the unauthorized publication of any papers by or relating to George Gordon, Lord Byron, and his wife Lady Byron.

There will be two articles about Mr. Coventry Patmore in the February magazines. Mr. Edmund Gosse in the Contemporary Review will put on record some interesting reminiscences of a friendship lasting many years, while Mr. Louis Garvin contributes to the Fortnightly Review a purely literary appreciation.

Under the title of "Oxford Classical Texts," the Delegates of the Clarendon Press undertook some time ago the preparation, for use in universities and schools, of a uniform series of Greek and Latin authors. They will be printed on good paper, from type specially cast for them, and will be issued at a low price. The text will be based in each instance on the best manuscripts, and will admit only the most convincing and necessary emendations. The following have been definitely promised:—Greek: Æschylus, edited by Mr. A. Sidgwick, Reader in Greek in the University of Oxford; Apollonius Rhodius, edited by Mr. R. C. Seaton, of Jesus College, Cambridge; Aristophanes, edited by Mr. W. M. Geldart, Fellow of St. John's College, Oxford, and Mr. F. W. Hall; Demosthenes, edited by Prof. S. H. Butcher; Euripides, edited by Prof. Murray, of Glasgow; Herodotus, edited by the Rev. G. C. Richards, of Cardiff; Homer, edited by the Provost of Oriel and Mr. T. W. Allen, of Queen's College, Oxford; Pindar, edited by Prof. W. R. Hardie, of Edinburgh; Plato, Vols. I. and II., edited by Prof. Burnet, of St. Andrews; 'The Republic' of Plato, edited by the Rev. E. J. Palmer, of Balliol; and Thucydides, edited by Mr. Stuart Jones, of Trinity College, Oxford. Latin: 'Cicero's Orations,' edited by Mr. A. C. Clark, of Queen's College, Oxford, Mr. S. G. Owen, of Christ Church, and the Rev. W. Y. Fausset; 'Cicero's Rhetorical Works,' edited by Prof. Wilkins, of Manchester; Juvenal and Persius, edited by Mr. S. G. Owen; Lucretius, edited by Mr. C. Bailey, of Exeter College; Plautus, edited by Mr. W. M. Lindsay, of Jesus College, Oxford; Propertius, edited by Mr. Phillimore, of Christ Church; Sallust, edited by Mr. A. M. Cook, of Wadham; Tacitus, edited by the Rev. H. Furneaux; Velleius Paterculus, edited by Prof. Robinson Ellis; and Virgil, edited by Mr. F. A. Hirtzel, of Brasenose.

The February number of Cosmopolis will contain a complete story by Anthony Hope, entitled 'The Necessary Resources.' Pierre Loti is to contribute an article on Felix Poppenberg, and M. Anatole France a short story entitled 'Mlle. Roscane.'

The February number of the Cornhill Magazine contains as its anniversary study—a special feature of the new series—an article by Major-General F. Maurice, C.B., on 'The Wreck of the Birkenhead,' in which he gives an account of the effect produced at a university lecture by the reading of Sir F. H. Doyle's poem on that disaster by the Rev. F. D. Maurice, the writer's father. Prof. Goldwin Smith contributes a critical essay on Canning; Mrs. A. Murray Smith supplements her previous studies on Westminster Abbey in 'Two Centuries of National Monuments'; and Canon Rawnsley, in a paper on the 'National Trust for Places of Historic Interest or Natural Beauty,' calls the attention of those who are anxious to commemorate the Queen's year to the aims and operations of that body. Mr. Pemberton-Grund continues his study of 'The Duels of All Nations,' the present instalment being devoted to those of America; and other articles include 'The Youth of the Napiers,' by Mr. Stephen Gwynn, and 'Diet and Medicine in China,' by Mr. E. H. Parker.

The second portion of Prof. W. M. Ramsay's 'Cities and Bishoprics of Phrygia,' completing the larger half of the book, will be published very shortly by the Clarendon Press. It deals with West and West Central Phrygia, and contains chapters on Eumeneia, Apameia, the Banaz-Ova, Akmonia and the Akmonian diocese, the Pentapolis of Phrygia, and on the Christian inscriptions of South-Western and Central Phrygia, the Jews in Phrygia, and the line of the trade route to the East. The author hopes that henceforward the North-Galatian theory of St. Paul's travels will be banished from scientific works, and that the Christian origin of the famous sepulchral inscription of Avircius will cease to be a matter of controversy.

A life of James Thomson, the poet of 'The Seasons,' has been written by Mr. Beresford Chancellor, and is to appear in weekly instalments in the Richmond and Twickenham Times.

Mr. Charles Edmonds, who died at Hastings on January 14th, used to be well known to literary men and lovers of books. He was born in 1816 at Alpha Road, St. John's Wood, the youngest son of Mr. David Barrett Edmonds, who was for many years in the War Office at the Tower of London. He was not originally intended for a bookseller, but, urged by his fondness for books, he persuaded his father to apprentice him to Mr. Henry G. Bohn, whose guinea catalogue he compiled. He afterwards went to Messrs. Willis & Sotheran's, 136, Strand, where he was for many years, and later on with Messrs. Sotheran & Co., 36, Piccadilly. His chief claim to fame was his discovery in 1867, in the library of Sir Charles Isham at Lamport Hall, of the 1599 edition of 'Venus and Adonis' and of other rare books of the Elizabethan period.

They had been collected about the time of their publication by Thomas Isham, who died in 1605, and some of them were recently secured by the British Museum. Messrs. Sotheran brought out for Mr. Edmonds a series of "Isham Reprints," containing, besides 'Venus and Adonis' and 'The Passionate Pilgrime,' 'Newes out of Powles Churchyarde,' 'Epigrammes written by Sir John Davies,' &c. He also edited the 'Basilicon Doron' and the 'Lamport Garland of Old Poetry' for the Roxburghe Club. Among his other publications were the 'Poetry of the Anti-Jacobin' and Mr. Nethercote's work on the 'Pytchley Hunt.' Mr. Edmonds twice established himself as a bookseller at Birmingham, but he returned to Messrs. Sotheran, with whom he remained as long as his health permitted.

The Bishop of St. David's, who died last week, if no great theologian, was an excellent scholar, although he published nothing more important than a set of notes on the 'Œdipus Tyrannus.' His chief work was his excellent 'History of St. David's,' written in conjunction with Mr. Freeman. He also wrote upon 'The Gael in Gwynned.'—Sir Travers Twiss, who died on the same day as the Bishop, began his career by publishing an abridgment of Niebuhr's 'Roman History' and an edition of Livy. He wrote pamphlets on the Oregon Question, on the Sleswick-Holstein imbroglio, and the Ecclesiastical Titles Bill. He published treatises on 'The Law of Nations.' Besides he edited 'The Black Book of the Admiralty,' Bracton's 'De Legibus et Consuetudinibus Angliæ' (six volumes), and also Glanville's treatise for the Rolls Series.

Mr. Joseph Jacobs has returned from a lecturing tour in the United States, in which he has delivered courses on English style before Johns Hopkins University, on the fables of Æsop before the Brooklyn Institute, and on Brer Rabbit and Buddha before the universities of Pennsylvania and Chicago.

A special committee, nominated by several of the associations which represent the interests of secondary schools in England, is about to collect and report upon the mass of evidence and opinion which has accumulated for some years past in favour of the systematic training of secondary teachers. An advance upon these lines is, perhaps, one of the most probable achievements of the extraordinary energy recently displayed by the teaching profession.

THE Welsh Eisteddfod is to have a counterpart in Ireland. Provision is being made for the celebration of the first "Oireachtas" this year, at which prizes will be offered for the best recitations, essays, poems, and songs in the Irish language.

THE three Welsh Congregational colleges of Carmarthen, Bala-Bangor, and Brecon have now agreed to consider a plan of amalgamation, under which they would jointly prepare candidates for the B.D. degree, the examination to be open to graduates in Arts of the University of Wales. The recent death of Dr. Morris and Dr. Herber Evans, the principals of two of these colleges, has facilitated the agreement.

BOTH Messrs. Sotheby's and Messrs. Christie's auction-rooms are more or less in the hands of the builders, and extensive alterations will be completed during the next few months. In each instance an additional gallery will be added. It is interesting to note that "Sotheby's" has only experienced the inconvenience of a "move" about three times in its long life of over a century and a half; whilst Christie's, which started in Pall Mall (the original site is not now discoverable), has simply migrated from that thoroughfare to King Street, its present headquarters—not a bad record for a hundred and thirty years.

LIEUT.-GENERAL M'LEOD INNES, V.C., whose 'Lucknow and Oude in the Mutiny' is now in its second edition, has in the press another and briefer volume, covering the whole field of the Mutiny. 'The Sepoy Revolt,' the title selected, will be issued early next month by Messrs. A. D. Innes & Co.

ARCHBISHOP IRELAND, of the Western-American diocese of St. Paul, whose name and work have been made known to English readers by Mr. Bodley, is about to appear as an author. 'The Church and Modern Society' will be the name of his book.

AN index volume to the ten volumes of 'Book-Prices Current' already published is in preparation.

THE Russian Imperial Academy of the Sciences, which had discontinued the publication of the great national dictionary of the Russian language on account of the death of its editor, Prof. de Grote, has just decreed the resumption of the task, and entrusted its direction to Mr. Schakhmatov, one of its Academicians. The last volume published had reached the letter E.

THE well-known philosopher and theologian Prof. Eduard Zeller, who is now in his eighty-third year, celebrated his fifty years' Professorenjubiläum on the 12th inst. at Stuttgart, whither several universities sent deputations with congratulatory addresses.

THE distinguished Swedish poet and physician Karl Herman Sätherberg died at Stockholm on the 9th inst. He was born at Tumba in 1812, and was educated at Strengnäs and Upsala, where he took his medical degree. In 1847 he became the President of the Orthopædic Institute in Stockholm, a post which he retained until 1879. His lyrical and descriptive poems, of which 'Alfhilda' is the best known, fill several volumes, and he was the author of a cycle of verse descriptive of the career of Linnæus and entitled 'The King of Flowers.' In 1896 Sätherberg published his memoirs. His contributions to medico-gymnastic literature are considerable.

MESSRS. WARRINGTON tell us that we were wrong in our guess that the 'Imperial Calendar' was formerly called the 'Royal.' The 'Royal' expired three years ago. Since its foundation in 1809, the 'Imperial' has always borne the same title.

FROM America the news reaches us of the death of Mr. Horatio Hale at the age of seventy-nine. We must defer our memoir of him till next week.

THE Parliamentary Papers of the week include the Annual Report of the Deputy Keeper of the Public Records (1*s.*).

SCIENCE

GEOGRAPHICAL LITERATURE.

THE new volume of "Stanford's Compendium of Geography and Travel (New Issue)" is Asia: Vol. II. Southern and Western Asia. It is from the pen of Mr. A. H. Keane, author of the excellent 'Africa' in the same series, and is, of course, published by Mr. Edward Stanford. We have noted in it a considerable number of trifling inaccuracies, of which we must name a few. Ali Musjid was not "stormed" in the last Afghan war, but shelled by field batteries at long range without result, and evacuated by the Afghans in the night when they found that troops had climbed the hills around and reached the western side of the Khyber defile. To have stormed it would have been very difficult had it been held. "Extremely romantic" is an odd description of the Quetta valley. Three fine rocky mountains are seen from it, and in Quetta itself there are poplars and willows; but there is finer scenery in all parts of Afghanistan and Baluchistan, which are under description, and in which the Quetta valley is thus picked out. "Mr. Salter Payne" (twice) is a misdescription of the Amir's factotum. Fort Sandeman, where there is a large British garrison, is omitted on the map; and "Musakheyl," which is marked, is not a place, but a tribe of nomads in tents. The remarkable military roads constructed in these frontier districts are neither marked on the map nor named in the text, and the Upper Zhob is marked as though its course was only conjectural, although it has been surveyed. Galle is described as an important harbour and port of call for steamers, although it is so bad a harbour that immense expenditure has long since been incurred on Colombo, which is geographically less well situate, and the mail steamers now touch at Colombo in place of Galle. "The famous fortress of Gwalior" is safe, but the addition, "one of the largest and strongest in the empire," suggests that it is a modern or British stronghold, such as Quetta or Rawul-Pindi, even if not a rival of Halifax, Gibraltar, or Malta. "There are three armies, belonging to the Presidencies of Bengal, Madras, and Bombay respectively, each army having a commander-in-chief," has long ceased to be true of India. There is now, by statute of the Parliament of the United Kingdom, but one army with one commander-in-chief, and by Indian military arrangement that army is divided under four commands. At p. 222 there is a confusion about the rivers of Siam, in which we fail to discover the author's meaning. In an account of the Meinam we are told that "the Mekhong is really an independent river, although.....often represented as a branch of the Meinam." In the account of Cyprus we are told that the locusts have been "nearly extirpated." The annual reports show that, though nearly extirpated in each "locust campaign," the insects continue every few years to form a heavy drain on the finance of the island. The Imperial grant to Cyprus is said to have "gradually fallen from 55,000*l.* in 1888 to nil in 1893." But there were two applications to Parliament last year in a single session, one towards the deficit of 1895-6, and one towards the deficit of 1896-7. No one would guess from the cut given for "Erzerum" that it is now a modern fortress of the first class, which is, indeed, about the only thing worth knowing in connexion with it. We are told of Perim that "the English batteries completely command the approaches of the Red Sea," which is entirely untrue, as the chart will show. A few pages further on the author says that Aden and "Perim command the whole of the Red and Arabian Seas, and keep open the water highway." Without the command of the sea Aden and Perim could do nothing except surrender to the power or alliance which possessed it. With that command they are useful ports, but in themselves they command nothing, any more than the French forts on the African shore "command" the channel between there and Perim, or than the Turkish fort at Bab-el-Mandeb commands the Red Sea. The spelling throughout the text is in conflict with that adopted for the maps, e.g., "Sawakin" and "Suakin," "Bushahr" and "Bushire," "Rasht" and "Resht," "Ispafan" and "Ispahan," and many others. The author proves the complicity of the Turkish Government in the massacres in Armenia from the fact that the Kurdish nomads were organized as a corps of cavalry named after the Sultan, and co-operated with Turkish troops in butchery. But the organization of the Hamadieh cavalry was stated some years ago to be a German military reform pressed on the Sultan in imitation of the reorganization of the Cossack cavalry of Russia.

The Continent of America: its Discovery and its Baptism. By John Boyd Thacher. (New York, Benjamin.)—The author, a well-known American bibliophile, has produced a work attractively written, sumptuously printed, and liberally illustrated with facsimiles of ancient maps and documents, but he has almost completely failed to throw fresh light upon controverted points—nay, some of the old hypotheses advocated by him have long since been abandoned by competent critics. His "chief purpose has been to establish the time and place of the naming of America," but only 54 out of a total of 270 pages are devoted to this subject. He follows good leaders when he identifies Watling Island with Guanahani; but in his account of Vespucci's voyages he blindly surrenders himself to the guidance of Varnhagen. He credits Vespucci with having on his apocryphal first voyage discovered the mainland of America, and believes him to have had serious combats with the natives of the Bermudas, notwithstanding the fact that these islands, when discovered, were found to be uninhabited. The part happily headed "The Baptismal Font of America" deals with St. Dié, and the company of geographers attracted thither by Duke René. This and the following part (which deals fully with Waldseemüller's 'Cosmographiæ Introductio') are by far the most satisfactory sections of the work. Mr. Thacher describes fully the four alleged editions of that work, and confirms the opinion of Mr. Henry C. Murphy, of Brooklyn, that the copy picked up by Mr. Eyriès at a Paris bookstall for 2*d.*, and now in the Lenox Library, is not an original edition at all, but is made up by the introduction into the genuine first edition of four leaves from later editions. The maps of the world and of Europe referred to in this little book, and in a small treatise by Ringmann, published at Strasbourg in 1511, are no doubt lost, although some of the maps in the Ptolemy of 1513 may be reductions from them; but not so the globe, as supposed by the author, for M. Gallois and other competent critics have shown that the globe formerly in the Hauslab Collection, and now in that of Prince Liechtenstein, is the one referred to by Waldseemüller as having been published by him in 1507. Many reprints and quotations from the works under discussion are given, and among these there are some reflections of Ringmann when examining Waldseemüller's map of Europe, which seem so appropriate to the present time that we cannot resist the temptation of reproducing them :—

"In regarding this map of Europe and considering how powerful is Spain, how rich and warlike is France, how great is Germany and how robust are her men, how strong is Great Britain, how brave is Poland, how valiant is Hungary, and how rich, courageous, and experienced in the military art is Italy, I could not but regret most grievously the cruel, harmful, and dreadful wars which our princes wage.....while they leave the Turk and the enemies of our faith to spill Christian blood, destroy cities, and devastate countries, burn churches, carry off our daughters, violate our wives, and commit the greatest crimes. On the other hand, if they would but give up these serious and perilous quarrels.....if, adopting peace and uniting their forces, they would take up arms against the common enemy, they would easily subjugate the entire world, and cause the blessed Saviour.....to be the object of worship by all nations."

Messrs. Rivington, Percival & Co. publish Vol. IV. (Europe) of A New Manual of Geography for Middle and Higher Forms, a volume which is free from the errors we have lately been forced to point out in several other manuals of geography. It is from the pen of Mr. E. R. Wethey.

ASTRONOMICAL NOTES.

THE Rev. Dr. Anderson, of Edinburgh, has discovered the variability of a star in the constellation Andromeda not hitherto catalogued. Its approximate place is R.A. $0^h\ 42^m\ 14^s$, N.P.D. 55° 7′. A slight increase in brightness was noticed between October 22nd and November 8th, 1896, when the magnitude was 8·5; subsequently it diminished, and was only 9·4 on December 24th.

The comet (f, 1896) which was discovered by Mr. Perrine at the Lick Observatory on the 2nd of November will, according to the calculations of Dr. Knopf, of Jena, arrive at perihelion on the 8th prox., at the distance from the sun of 1·062 in terms of the earth's mean distance. It will continue to approach the earth and increase in apparent brightness until the month of April, but will be visible only in the southern hemisphere, being throughout February and March in the eastern part of the constellation Sagittarius, and moving in a south-westerly direction.

The comet (g, 1896) which was discovered by the same astronomer on the night of the 8th of December proves to be moving in an elliptic orbit, the period of which, according to Dr. Ristenpart, of Heidelberg, amounts to about seven years, and the elements present a striking resemblance to those of the lost comet of Biela. It is now in the south-western part of the constellation Orion, but will soon be out of the reach of any but the most powerful telescopes.

Mr. R. G. Aitken, of the Lick Observatory, communicates to No. 3395 of the Astronomische Nachrichten a series of double-star measures obtained with the 12-inch and 36-inch equatorials of that observatory in the years 1895 and 1896.

We regret to announce the death of Mr. T. G. E. Elger, F.R.A.S., which occurred at Bedford on the 9th inst., in the sixtieth year of his age. Though Mr. Elger made also some valuable planetary and other observations, he is chiefly known as an astronomer for his numerous contributions to selenography, and for his excellent work on the moon, which was published in 1895, and contains a full description and map of its principal physical features, written in a way to make the subject of general interest. Mr. Elger was director of the lunar section of the British Astronomical Association, and contributed a valuable series of selenographical notes to the Observatory.

SOCIETIES.

STATISTICAL.—Jan. 19.—A paper 'On Local Death-Rates in England and Wales in the Ten Years 1881-90' was read by Mr. T. A. Welton.

METEOROLOGICAL.—Jan. 20.—Annual General Meeting.—Mr. E. Mawley, President, in the chair.—The Secretary read the report of the Council, which showed that the Society had made steady progress during the past year, there being an increase of seventeen in the number of Fellows.—The President then delivered an address on 'Shade Temperatures.'

INSTITUTION OF CIVIL ENGINEERS.—Jan. 15.—Students' Meeting.—A paper 'On the Monier System of Construction' was read by Mr. W. Beer.

MATHEMATICAL.—Jan. 14.—Prof. Elliott, President, in the chair.—Mr. W. H. Blythe and Prof. E. H. Moore were elected Members.—Prof. Sylvester spoke at some length on the partition of an even number into two primes, and answered numerous questions which were put to him.—Mr. J. J. Walker gave a solution of a certain quadratic vector equation.—The titles of the following papers were read: 'Supplementary Note on Matrices,' by Mr. J. Brill,—and 'Some Properties of Bessel's Functions,' by Dr. Hobson.—Mr. T. I. Dewar exhibited, with the aid of stereoscopes, a large number of diagrams of the algebraic catenary.

HUGUENOT.—Jan. 13.—Sir H. W. Peek, Bart., President, in the chair.—Messrs. D. J. V. Durell, C. Mercier, G. B. Reid, C. P. Taylor, and C. M. Tenison were elected Fellows.—The State Library of Pennsylvania was also entered as subscribing.—A paper was read 'On the Walloon Industries of Canterbury in the Sixteenth and Seventeenth Centuries,' by Mr. F. W. Cross, and several contemporary MSS. relating to the subject were exhibited.

Science Gossip.

THE Marquis of Bute has provided funds for the erection of a new suite of medical class-rooms at St. Andrews University, as well as an endowment for two years of the lectureship on physiology, to which Miss Umpherston has been appointed.

PROF. KÖLLIKER will celebrate on July 6th the fifty years' jubilee of his professorial activity at Würzburg. On the same day falls his eightieth birthday.

THE sixty-ninth congress of the German Naturforscher und Aerzte will be held at Brunswick from the 19th to the 25th of September, and is to consist of not fewer than thirty-three scientific sections.

MR. HOWARTH and Mr. Platnauer have published an excellent Report of Proceedings (Dulau) at the Glasgow meeting of the Museums Association last summer.

FINE ARTS

Old Cornish Crosses. By A. G. Langdon. Illustrated. (Truro, Pollard.)

MR. LANGDON, whose previous labours in behalf of Cornish antiquities entitle him to a lofty monolith in elvan (may its occasion be long delayed!), undertook an arduous task when he resolved to prepare this monograph on a complex and difficult subject. He says truly that Cornwall contains many more than three hundred crosses, to say nothing of pillar and inscribed stones, coped stones, and recumbent cross-slabs. To each he devotes a reasonable amount of space; of a very large proportion he supplies cuts to the accuracy of which we can in many instances bear testimony from personal knowledge, but of several classes of these antiquities he has described, and of others, such as bases deprived of their stems, of which he notices only "thirty or forty," we are in a position to say that his lists are far from complete. For example, speaking from memory only, we may mention that there is a good specimen at Roscarrock Cross, Trelights, Port Isaac, and another remaining by the roadside between the Gannell and Crantock churchtown. The former is in St. Endellion parish; the second in that of Crantock. From Morwenstow in the north to the Lizard these bases are to be found by dozens, and their frequency, taken with the much greater numbers of crosses still standing, shows how many must have been in existence before time, ignorance, and greed destroyed the majority. It is only in districts where granite and other materials of unusual durability exist that anything like so many relics of the kind are still to be found; where slate was common, as in parts of Cornwall and Derbyshire, hardly any remain, although formerly they were no doubt quite as numerous. From similar causes the crosses of limestone, sandstone, and other friable substances, which once crowded the Midland and Southern counties, have comparatively seldom survived. Few Gothic crosses made of sandstone retain in churchyards their sculptured heads.

While commenting with justifiable pride, such as every Cornishman must feel, upon the number of these memorials still existing in the West, Mr. Langdon does not make due allowance for the causes of their survival in hundreds. When, too, he deals with the motives of those who set them up, he, it seems to us, leaves his readers a little in the dark. These are trivial shortcomings in the performance of a prodigious task. It was time, too, that an indomitable enthusiast should arise to record the existence and exact positions of these ancient and humble, yet characteristic relics. Thus it is known to antiquaries that a Cornishman once actually gave to a stranger from Sussex a four-holed cross of grey elvan, with a panelled shaft and the sacred emblem enclosed by a glory; in short, a specimen of the first class. The stranger caused it to be set up in the grounds of the Manor House at Eastbourne, where it now is, with a brass plate screwed to the back of it! No wonder Mr. Langdon wrings his hands over it, as he does over another cross of the same sort from St. Michael Penkivel, which has traversed the Atlantic and been placed in the church of Dundas, Ontario! May the earth lie heavy upon Davies Gilbert, who, though he was President of the Royal Society, was guilty of one of these unpatriotic deeds; but what charity can cover the shame of the Cornishman who parted with the two crosses an informant of Mr. Langdon's once saw in a garden in Westminster Bridge Road?

A considerable proportion of these relics have been recovered from stone hedges, where labourers preserved them by building them in; at least as many have been found converted into gate-posts; others still exist as bars of stiles and are hourly trodden on; chance has revealed not a few lying face downwards upon lonely moors, by out-of-the-way roadsides or footpaths, as at "Rosepletha" (should be Rhospletha), in St. Levan-in-Penwith, or in open fields, as at Tresinney-in-Advent, a slender example nearly 9 ft. high. At St. Breock-in-Pyder the natives, proud of their relic, duly whitewashed its face and joined its head to its stem with an iron clamp; at Quethiock, near Menheniot, a magnificent specimen 13 ft. high, and enriched with scroll-work, a triquetra knot, plait-work, an equal-limbed cross, and a glory, was broken in half with hammers and its halves used for opposite gate-posts; at St. Teath, Trigg Minor, nearly as good a specimen was used as a bridge over a pond, and later its fragments served as coping for a wall and to carry the pivoting of the churchyard gates; at Redgate, St. Cleer, an exceedingly fine stone inscribed in Saxon minuscule letters, on behalf of a Cornish prince of the ninth century, "Doniert rogavit pro anima," lay in a pit for many years, although Camden and others recorded its existence and value; at Lanhydrock, Bodmin, the four-armed cross was deprived of its glory and thrown down upon the ground, to remain there for many years. A last instance of this record of ignorance and indifference is the tallest cross in Cornwall, now in the churchyard at St. Mylor, Falmouth, said to have originally marked the grave of St. Mylor himself, which, in 1870, was found head downwards, doing duty as a prop for the south wall of the church! This magnificent monolith of granite is 17 ft. 6 in. high, has a round head (cross and glory) 2 ft. in diameter, and is 1 ft. 4 in. square at the foot of the stem. It is a pity that, when again placed upright, the stem was set 7 ft. in the earth, so that the apparent height of the monument is only about 10 ft.

Mr. Langdon furnishes a brief account of his conclusions as to the introduction of Christianity into Cornwall, a matter of great moment for those who wish to date these crosses; but he wisely takes no notice of the wild suggestion that these relics, or at least some of them, are older in date than the introduction of Christianity. We have, in fact, no authority for affirming that this event happened before the fourth century. On the other hand, it does not seem likely that, while British bishops from districts much more remote attended the Council of Arles, early in the fourth century, a province which was in much closer relationship with the Continent than Ireland remained in pagan darkness while Hibernia and Cumbria, and even Wales, called themselves Christian provinces. It is certain that in Cornwall quite early in the fifth century the Pelagian heresy sorely vexed the Gallic bishops Germanus and Lupus; therefore we infer some sort of Christianity prevailed there. There is on this account, then, no reason for refusing older dates than, say, A.D. 420 to some of the Cornish crosses. The historical evidence is not sufficient to settle the question, while the style of what remains is rude enough. Only one thing is quite certain: the influence of Ireland upon the art as well as the religion of Cornwall has been exaggerated. As the dedications of the churches of the province distinctly show, most of the missionary saints of the county bore Gaulish, Breton, or Welsh names, generally in Latinized forms. The same inference is clear from the fact remarked by Mr. Langdon, that "the Celtic patterns on the Cornish crosses are more akin to those occurring in Wales than to those of Ireland, Scotland, or Northumbria. There are a few Christian inscribed stones in Brittany that have points in common with those of Cornwall." This is just what one would expect, for the set of trade and intercourse from Cornwall to Brittany was much stronger than from Cornwall towards Wales or Ireland. The sum of our own inquiries is that the highly characteristic patterns existing in the West are more closely allied to such few examples as remain in Brittany than to the more numerous relics in Wales. They are ruder in Cornwall and Brittany than in Wales, and still more so than in Ireland. But mere rudeness of design cannot settle the age of any of them.

This book contains capital remarks upon the relation between the crosses and those inscribed stones of which, as our author rightly has it, "Cornwall can proudly boast the possession" of much the largest share. These latter bearing the Chi Rho monogram of the well-known form indicate that some of both cannot be less ancient than the seventh century. They may, indeed, be, and very probably are, as old as the fifth century, or even the preceding one:—

> "The presence of this monogram on Cornish stones is evidence not only of their great age, but likewise tends to show that Christianity must have been introduced into Cornwall at a very early period."

This is the very safe conclusion of a somewhat over-cautious antiquary. At Phillack and in St. Helen's Chapel, Cape Cornwall, are two examples of the ancient Chi Rho monogram; others, not quite so old, appear at Southhill, at St. Just-in-Penwith, and Doydon. On the back of the pillar stone at Casteldôr is a Tau cross; equal-limbed crosses are carved or incised on a number of the upright stones in view throughout this book, while a large proportion of the remainder, exhibiting crosses of the Latin form, may presumably, but not positively, be dated later.

To us it has always appeared clear that caprice, if not sheer ignorance or indifference, had a very great deal to do with the delineation of these crosses upon the monoliths. If we did not know better, it would be easy to suppose that St. Andrew was referred to by many a cross saltire. At Ludgvan-in-Penwith there is a quaint cross which is quite lop-sided, so careless was the carver. When the crucifix is carved on cross-heads, whether with or without the glory, as in the stone (by the natives called "Paul") which is mounted on the churchyard wall of St. Paul, Mousehole, the legs are placed in the earlier or Byzantine manner, i.e., side by side, not being crossed at the ankles. Far the greater number of these effigies are so arranged all over the county. There can be little doubt that the relic at St. Paul dates from about 675 at the very least. On the back of the cross are the five bosses referring to the Five Wounds of Christ. A man now living in St. Paul remembers this precious sculpture standing in a neighbouring stone hedge, from which it was removed to the churchyard wall. It ought to be again removed, so as to be out of the reach of the boys who are spoiling it. It is one of the finest examples of the kind, and we commend it to the zealous care of the learned Rector of St. Paul. There are similar crosses at St. Wendron-in-Kerrier, at St. Buryan-in-Penwith, and at St. Erth, near Hayle. It seems to us that the same hand carved them all, and that they are clearly of the same age.

The "Probable Object of the Erection of the Crosses" is the title of a chapter upon which Mr. Langdon has expended much learning and acumen. He proves that many of them were intended to indicate the way to the churches — at least, they often occur alongside churchpaths and point churchwards; some were landmarks; many may have stood at the intersection of roads upon those vast moorlands which, in earlier days, occupied an even larger part of Cornwall than now.

ANNUALS.

The Year's Art, 1897 (Virtue & Co.), does not in this, its eighteenth volume, depart from the traditions of its useful career. This volume opens with a rather whimsical "résumé of the art work" of 1896 by Mr. R. A. M. Stevenson, and a much sounder series of notes on architecture by Mr. H. Statham, who writes without prejudices and fancies of any kind, although he is not nearly so amusing, we must confess, as his colleague. If we except an exaggerated estimate of the importance of the labours of the late William Morris in developing the applied arts — an estimate which makes hardly any allowance for the labours of anybody else in the same direction—we have nothing but praise for the less ambitious elements of the book. We sympathize with the managers, compelled, we suppose, to find noteworthy subjects for the portraits with which it is the custom to adorn the volume. They were in dire straits last year, and introduced their readers to several of the illustrious obscure; they are not quite so badly off in 1897, and agreeable likenesses of Sir E. J. Poynter, Mr. Corbett, Mr. M. Fisher, Mr. T. G. Jackson, and Mr. W. L. Wyllie are examples of desirable portraits that reflect lustre upon those of other men who are, as yet, undistinguished. On the other hand, no ladies are included among the selected. The records concerning the multitude of art galleries, clubs, societies, and schools now existing in these realms will surprise the uninitiated. About many of them 'The Year's Art' supplies all desirable information, about every one of them something. There is, especially for "outsiders," an interesting section on the sales of works of art during 1896. Of course, no one should base any calculation on the extravagant as well as extraordinary prices quoted as having been given for many of the pictures mentioned under this head. There has been, it appears, a considerable fall of late. In 1886 26 pictures fetched 1,470*l.* and more each; in 1892 the number rose to 55, and in 1895 the number was still 45, but in 1896 it fell to 28, buyers and dealers having, of course, the death duties before their eyes. The energies of the trade have been of late much occupied in running up the prices of Romneys, with the result that 'Ladies Clifden and Spencer,' by no means a masterpiece of the artist's, was knocked down for 11,025*l.*, 'Mrs. Oliver' for 3,255*l.*, 'Miss H. Shore' for 2,887*l.*, 'Maria and Catherine Thurlow' for 2,677*l.* The same 'Miss H. Shore' was sold in 1875 for 1,953*l.*, a price which was considerably above the average paid previously for much better Romneys. On the whole, the part of this volume most frequently consulted will be the large and copious "Directory of Artists," comprising nearly 6,000 names. Some years ago, when commenting on the directories which preceded 'The Year's Art,' we stated that Messrs. Rowney issued in 1850 the first compilation of the kind. This was true so far as there had been none for a long time previous to that date. There was, however, a similar directory published in 'The Annals of the Fine Arts' in 1817 and a few succeeding years.

The most important essays and criticisms in the fifteenth volume of the third series of the Gazette des Beaux-Arts are a series of papers by M. Valabrègue upon the German and Swiss artists represented in the gallery at Bâle. These artists are particularly fortunate in the revival of their reputation when almost forgotten by the official catalogue of M. D. Burckhart, whose perspicacity enabled him to assign to an anonymous follower of Memlinc a certain portrait of an elderly 'Pivs Ioachim,' which every modern student who has seen it has admired, while rejecting the popular attribution of it to Schöngauer. It is noteworthy that at Bâle, where, of all places in the world, Schöngauer ought to have been understood, several works, especially drawings in a style he knew nothing of, were for a long time ascribed to him. Some years since M. E. Müntz devoted considerable attention to these drawings, and was by no means disposed to accept the names they bore. To Lorenzo Lotto not only is ample justice done by Herr von Tschudi and Mr. Berenson, by the former more correctly than by the latter, but in the Gazette he has occupied the attention of M. E. Michel, who adds to our obligations to him in a study of the 'Adoration des Bergers' of Hugo van der Goes. To M. Leprieur is due a series of papers on 'Le Centenaire de la Lithographie,' which seems to have attracted notice on this side of the Channel, where lithography has gone out of vogue to a much greater degree than in Paris. Among other excellent papers which add to the value of this volume are the second and third essays on Jean Perréal, his life and work, by M. Maulde la Clavière. M. E. de Goncourt supplies two vivacious notices of 'Le Grenier'; M. Bonnaffé writes 'A propos du Trésor de Bosco Reale.' Also worthy of attention are M. M. Emmanuel's essay on 'La Danse Grecque Antique' (see Athen. No. 3592); M. C. Yriarte's sixth and concluding article on 'Isabelle d'Este et les Artistes de son Temps'; a long paper on 'La Vache de Myron' by M. P. Paris; and M. A. Gruyer's criticisms of Jean Fouquet's portrait of the Treasurer Étienne Chevalier with his patron St. Stephen (evidently another portrait), which occupies the left wing of a diptych formerly at Melun, now in the Brentano Collection at Frankfort. The other wing, representing the Virgin and Child, is in the gallery at Antwerp, and was at one time said to comprise a portrait of Agnes Sorel, who, according to various traditions, had a fancy for sitting to painters in a more or less naked condition. All these figures are of life size and in oil. Agnes died in 1450, two years before Catherine Budé, wife of the Treasurer, in whose honour Fouquet, at her husband's command, adorned her tomb at Melun with this same diptych, which is of exceptional size for the work of a miniaturist.

All students who desire to understand the controversy regarding the tiara of Olbia cannot do better than read the essay by M. T. Reinach which is a leading feature in the sixteenth volume of the Gazette des Beaux-Arts. In it the author joins issue with M. Wesselovsky and Prof. Furtwängler, who, as the French archæologist dryly says, has not only the advantage of knowing his subject, but of having seen and handled the relic in dispute. The Russian gentleman's case was considerably weakened when the Keeper of the Antiquities in the Hermitage, going to Paris prepared to doubt the tiara, which he had not then seen, authorized M. Kaempfen to declare that he considered not only the tiara to be authentic, but its appendages to be beyond challenge. M. Reinach addresses himself most effectively to the refutation of his Teutonic antagonist. We hope we have heard the last of this discussion. M. Valabrègue completes his notes on the Museum at Bâle; what M. M. Reymond writes upon Ghiberti is interesting; a pleasant and searching paper by M. G. Schéfer tells us of the portraits which he has recognized in the pictures of Watteau; M. Solomon Reinach's 'Courrier de l'Art Antique' reaches its thirteenth section; and various papers of more temporary interest deal with the Salons of 1896, as well as with the decoration (comprising some very wild freaks of design) of Paris during the Tsar's recent visit.

PETERBOROUGH CATHEDRAL.

The Dean and Chapter of Peterborough have persisted in their determination to begin the pulling down of the west front, without giving a hearing to those who are prepared to show by experiment at their own expense that repair without demolition is possible, and, indeed, not difficult. The work of destruction began on the north gable of the front on Tuesday, the 12th inst., and not much has been done yet; but already we are told that the stones are "perished to a greater extent than was expected." Just so. It is the beginning of the course of discovery which the defenders of the old building have foreseen from the first. Once we were told that only a part of one gable was to be taken down. The part proved to be no less than the whole and something beyond that. Then we were told that only eighteen stones would need to be replaced by new, now that they are perished to a greater extent than was expected. And so it will be to the end. In spite of the affected grief of the Dean and Chapter over the sad necessity for pulling down, does any one believe that they have not been determined to pull down from the first, or that Mr. Pearson will cease from making such discoveries as that announced at the beginning of the work so long as two stones of the old front remain standing? And for the building which is to be put in its place—well, the stones will be found to be perished to a greater extent than was expected.

The decree for the destruction of the front was made at a meeting of the "Restoration" Committee, a rather nebulous body behind which the Dean and Chapter have found it convenient to hide themselves more than once. At that meeting Mr. Thompson, the contractor—who had no business to be present at all—was put forward by the destroying party, and said that he would not risk the lives of his men by attempting to carry out the scheme of preserving the front. This, no doubt, sounded very terrible and convincing to the committee, who did not understand the technicale of the case, and turned their votes the way the Dean and Chapter wished. But to practical men who know the building it only shows Mr. Thompson speaking as a partisan and not as an expert.

The specification issued by the Society of Antiquaries has the disadvantage of being without diagrams, because the Dean and Chapter, who are so grieved about the necessity of pulling down, forbade those who wished to show them how it might be saved all access to the building as soon as they came to understand that the offer of help was serious. Nevertheless, the specification demonstrates how unnecessary is the destruction which has been forced on by the Dean and Chapter, Mr. Pearson, Sir Arthur Blomfield, and, we must now add, the contractor. The specification is preceded by a statement of the action taken for the preservation of the west front of the cathedral. It is moderately worded, but shows the crooked tactics of the destroyers, and their persistent efforts to prevent any interference with their predetermined plan to pull the building down. We have heard that there are some upon the Chapter who have not sided with the Dean and Canon Clayton, the spokesmen on the destroying side. If it be so, we are sorry for the minority; but unless they speak out in their own defence they must share the obloquy which their colleagues have earned.

The work of the societies will not be thrown away though the front of Peterborough Cathedral may be sacrificed to the caprice and vanity of a few men. All over the country the press has shown how large an interest the public is taking in the matter: for one expression of approval of the destroying scheme there have been at least twenty opposed to it, and this is an indication that the Chapter may not easily get the eleven thousand pounds they ask for. The press has afforded them scarcely any direct support. The nearest approach to it in any important paper has been an article in the Times of Tuesday, the 12th inst., the writer of which showed his appreciation of the matter by declaring that as one scheme proposed to rebuild the back of the wall and the other both the back and the front, the difference was only that "'twixt Tweedledum and Tweedledee." Let him think this over with respect to a picture by Titian, and see how it works out. This same writer professes much admiration for Lord Grimthorpe, whom he calls the scourge of architects—much the same sort of scourge, we take it, as the Shakspearean Thersites was to the Greek heroes. But the mention of scourges calls to mind what Gibbon records of the Emperor Majorian, who tried to stop the degenerate citizens of Rome from destroying the great buildings with which their predecessors had adorned the city. He imposed a fine of 2,000*l.* on every magistrate who sanctioned such destruction, "and threatened to chastise the criminal obedience of their subordinate officers by severe whipping and the amputation of both their hands." A fine of 2,000*l.* imposed on each member of the Chapter of Peterborough would produce more than would be needed for the proper repair of the front. But we should not like to whip Mr. Thompson or to take off his hands. Some milder way might be found of teaching him not to talk mischievous nonsense again.

Fine-Art Gossip.

The Society of Painters in Water Colours opens next week a special exhibition of works by Lord Leighton, Mr. A. W. Hunt, the brothers Fripp, Mr. Beavis, Mr. E. K. Johnson, and Mr. Du Maurier.

On Thursday evening of last week Mr. John Singer Sargent, who for the first time in this country exhibited a picture in 1882, and became an Associate of the Royal Academy in 1894, was elected a Royal Academician; at the same time Mr. Alfred Parsons, who first exhibited here in 1868, and Mr. James Jebusa Shannon, who has been an exhibitor from 1881, were elected Associates.

Messrs. Christie, Manson & Woods sold on the 16th and 18th inst. the following. Drawing: F. Morgan, 'In the Hayfield,' 51*l.* Pictures: T. Faed, 'The Glee Maiden,' and the Engraving by F. Holl, 110*l.*; G. Morland, 'The Gamekeeper's Return,' 472*l.*; E. Verboeckhoven, 'Interior of a Shed, with ewes, lambs, and poultry,' 336*l.*

The inside of the Lady Chapel of Gloucester Cathedral is being grimthorped in secret. The outside, which needed repair, has been subjected to wholesale renovation. But promises were given that the inside, which did not want anything done to it, should be respected, and on several occasions the Dean has publicly given his word that nothing should be done to the reredos whilst he is in authority to prevent it. A few days since a visitor to the cathedral was told that orders had been given that no one was to be admitted to the chapel, and the vergers were forbidden to speak about it. Nevertheless he saw into it, and found "restoration" in full career. The tile pavement, the largest and most perfect of its kind and date in England, was all torn up, and the place spread with concrete. Whether operations had begun upon the reredos he was not able to see. It will be remembered that this reredos, though terribly shattered, is to the artist and antiquary a most important monument, for nothing of the same kind is to be found anywhere else. And if, after repeated promises to spare it, it is given as a prey to the vulgar "restorer," the public confidence in deans and chapters as guardians of our cathedral churches will receive a blow scarcely less heavy than they of Peterborough have just given it; and the hands of those who wish to bring about a change will be proportionately strengthened. We believe that the professional direction of the work at Gloucester is with Mr. Waller of that city and Mr. J. L. Pearson.

Everybody who has been in Paris remembers the charm of the group of trees on the right bank of the Seine adjoining the Pont Royal, which, longer than we can remember, has added greatly to the beauty of the incomparable view which embraces the river from Notre Dame, the Ile St. Louis, the Ile de la Cité, the Louvre, the Tuileries, and all Paris as far as the Arc de l'Étoile. When we say that it is actually proposed to destroy these trees and devote the land from which they spring to an extension of the quai at that place, we have said all that need be said of an act of stupid vandalism of which London could not show the like.

It is not ominous of good that a former Minister of Public Instruction and the Fine Arts in Japan has arrived in Paris on account of his Government to study the methods of teaching art in France. We trust he may not come to London with the same object.

Prof. Heierli, of Zurich, at the request of the Historical Society of Thurgau, has undertaken the publication of an archæological map of the canton, with an introduction and an index of "finds."

MUSIC

THE WEEK.

St. James's Hall.—Henschel Concerts; Popular Concerts; Mr. Lamond's Pianoforte Recital.
Garrick Theatre.—Carl Rosa Opera: 'Tannhäuser'; 'Romeo and Juliet'; 'La Vivandière.'

A concise and admirably selected programme was put forward at the third of Mr. Henschel's Symphony Concerts on Thursday evening last week. It opened with Schumann's beautiful overture to his only opera, 'Genoveva,' which is not by any means likely to be revived on the stage in London, owing to the want of dramatic grip in the music. Beethoven's 'Elegiac Ode,' Op. 118, for four voices and strings, was repeated by desire, the soloists (Mrs. Henschel, Miss Gondar, Mr. Walter Ford, and Mr. George Holmes) doing full justice to music which is curiously like the English glees of the period in phraseology. The central feature of the concert was Tschaïkowsky's justly admired 'Symphonie Pathétique' in B minor, the rendering of which, though not wanting in merit, could not compare with that under Herr Richter a few weeks previously, the tempi being at times too quick and the phrasing not sufficiently tender and pathetic. On the whole, however, it was a creditable performance. Miss Ilona Eibenschütz was heard to much advantage in Grieg's Pianoforte Concerto in A minor. The concert ended with Wagner's Overture to 'Tannhäuser,' which was better played than on some previous occasions.

Prof. Villiers Stanford's Quartet in A minor, Op. 45, repeated at the Popular Concert last Saturday afternoon, improves on acquaintance, and is unquestionably a work of great merit and interest. The very promising young pianist Miss Katie Goodson made a most suitable selection in Schumann's 'Kinderscenen,' Op. 15, which she played delightfully, and although she is as yet little more than a child, Miss Goodson has the making of an artist. The remaining items in the programme consisted of songs by Schumann and other composers, tastefully sung by Mr. Kennerley Rumford, and familiar works by Handel and Beethoven.

Monday's scheme opened with a novelty at these concerts, namely, Tschaïkowsky's String Quartet in D, Op. 11, the first effort of the Russian master in this branch of his art, and certainly not deficient in his individuality of utterance. The slow movement, andante cantabile in B flat, is extremely expressive, and as interpreted by Lady Halle and Messrs. Ries, Gibson, and Piatti, the quartet made a warm impression. We cannot so warmly commend M. Slivinski in Schumann's 'Carnaval,' as the rendering was rather wanting in technical accuracy and in sentimental feeling. Rubinstein's brilliant Trio ended the concert, and songs were interpreted with acceptance by Miss Thudichum.

Mr. Frederic Lamond has been a stranger to our shores for a considerable period, and London amateurs would seem to have forgotten him, for there was a singularly small audience at the first of his pianoforte recitals on Tuesday afternoon. He has greatly developed his talent during his residence in Germany, and gave really fine performances of Beethoven's Sonata in F minor, Op. 57, and Brahms's extremely difficult Variations on a Theme by Paganini, Op. 35. Splendid technique was also displayed in Chopin's Sonata in B flat minor, though we think the Funeral March was taken somewhat too fast. At his next recital Mr. Lamond will play Beethoven's great Sonata in B flat, Op. 106, and Schumann's 'Études Symphoniques.'

As the London season of the Carl Rosa Opera Company is to be limited to three weeks, it would be unreasonable to expect elaborate stage arrangements, especially in such a small theatre as the Garrick; but surely more care and taste might have been exercised in the performance of 'Tannhäuser' on Monday night. It should be remembered that Wagner desired his works to be regarded as combinations of the arts, the music not being the only element of importance. The master's directions as to the staging were far from being strictly observed; but we hasten to add that, vocally considered, the performance was extremely commendable. Mr. Hedmondt, though he did not look much like a mediæval Minnesinger, sang well and acted very finely. Miss Rita Elandi was in all respects sympathetic as Elizabeth, and Mr. Ludwig was, as usual, excellent in the part of Wolfram. The chorus possesses good quality of tone, and the general performance under Herr Richard Eckhold may be praised.

Gounod's now favourite opera 'Romeo and Juliet' was most creditably rendered on the following night. Mr. Brozel was in good voice, and sang well as the hero, and Miss Alice Esty was a sweet Juliet. Mr. Alec Marsh as Mercutio, Mr. Charles Tilbury as Friar Laurence, Miss Lillie Williams as Gertrude, and Miss Lily Heenan as Stephano, all showed themselves equal to their duties, and the chorus was again admirable.

'La Vivandière,' a three-act opera by the late Benjamin Godard, enjoyed much success at the Paris Opéra Comique, and English provincial audiences seem to have found pleasure in it since its production in this country at Liverpool in March last year. M. Henri Cain's libretto is little better than that of a French opéra-bouffe; that is to say, the principal characters and the plot generally are inconsistent and improbable to the last degree. Donizetti wrote a once popular, but now neglected opera 'The Daughter of the Regiment,' and 'La Vivandière' might be termed 'The Mother of the Regiment,' for the heroine is a middle-aged woman with iron-grey locks, and her principal mission, apart from her duty as being in the van of the French Revolutionary army, is to save the young hero, who has taken the side of the Republicans against his father, the Marquis de Rieul, an elderly aristocrat. The father is taken prisoner, and would be shot as a rebel; but the son George rescues him, with the timely assistance of Marion the vivandière, and finally an amnesty is declared, all being pardoned. Apart from one or two episodes, such as that when the heroine takes compassion on George's sweetheart Joanne, and promises to be a mother to her, the book is silly, and its translation by Mr. George Whyte cannot be praised. With respect to the music, there is no occasion to enter into details, as there is not the smallest likelihood of 'La Vivandière' holding the London stage. Much of it is in the style of light comic opera, but there are some numbers that command approbation, such as the berceuse sung by Marion, the love duet, and the military dances. Mlle. Zélie de Lussan sang beautifully in the titular part; Mr. Hedmondt and Miss Bessie MacDonald were highly acceptable as the lovers; and Messrs. Alec Marsh, William Paull, and Charles Tilbury did well in other parts. Concerning the remaining performances of the week notice must be reserved.

RECENT PUBLICATIONS.

The Early Correspondence of Hans von Bülow. Edited by his Widow. Selected and translated into English by Constance Bache. (Fisher Unwin.)—It can scarcely be said that the late pianist and conductor Hans von Bülow met with the measure of appreciation in this country that he deserved; but the apathy of English amateurs towards him, especially during the last years of his life, was mainly due to his eccentricities of speech and manner, which eventually developed into cerebral disease. It should not be forgotten that Bülow gave pianoforte recitals unaided nearly a quarter of a century ago, a time when such performances were practically new to London. He was at his best as an interpreter of Beethoven, whose sonatas were generally played in a cold and perfunctory manner except when Madame Schumann paid us her annual visits. He was a doughty champion of Wagner, even when his domestic relations with the Bayreuth master were of a somewhat curious nature, and some remarkably fine performances of Wagnerian excerpts were given under his direction at St. James's Hall. Frau Marie von Bülow, his widow, has written an eloquent preface to the German edition of the present volume, and Miss Bache supplies one for her own book, explaining that the selection from the 240 original letters was made with a view to interest English readers. She adds, with some truth :—

"Hans von Bülow has been, with one exception, the 'best abused' musician of our day. He has been more misunderstood, more laughed at, and even sneered at, than any other except Wagner. The reasons for this judgment are superficial and are not far to seek. Bülow had a hasty tongue, and he was apt to say exactly what he meant without softening down the edges."

Miss Bache continues, with justification, as follows :—

"It must be borne in mind that very many of these letters are to his parents, and in these he gives the reins to his aspirations, disappointments, and confidences with a naïveté and absolute truthfulness rare even between parent and child."

The majority of the early letters, commencing in 1830, are addressed to his mother, but some to his father, to whom he always wrote in terms of respect, although his parents had become estranged from each other for some time. Hans did not know for a week of his father's death, which occurred suddenly on September 16th, 1853, and thus he writes to his sister :—

"I am too violently shaken, too painfully smitten, so stupefied, I might say, in mind and strength, that I am unable to answer your beautiful letter as it deserves; to give you, or rather to return to you, anything like what you have given me.....Your tender sisterly love will well imagine what my feelings here must be; how each of the countless memories of him whom I loved as deeply—though he doubted it—as I honoured him, and how the picture of our lost one, must awaken the most poignant grief at his absence."

Here speaks the man; as to the musician this volume may be consulted with advantage, though it must be confessed the style of the letters is rather spasmodic, and at times almost hysterical. They finish in May, 1855.

Wagner's Heroines. By Constance Maud. (Arnold.)—When speaking of the writer's previous book, entitled 'Wagner's Heroes,' we suggested that a companion volume might follow, as the subject was by no means exhausted. The present book supplies the deficiency, for we have here descriptive chapters on 'The Nibelung's Ring,' 'The Flying Dutchman,' and 'Tristan and Isolde,' the heroines of these three music dramas being, of course, kept in prominence, though the story in each instance is intelligibly told. The dedication is to "all children, big and little, who liked 'Wagner's Heroes.'" With reference to Isolde, the author says truly that it must be remembered that she is Wagner's Isolde, and that the great poet-musician saw her with other eyes than either old Sir Thomas Malory, Matthew Arnold, or Mr. Swinburne, though each of these poets told most charming tales of her. In telling Wagner's dramatic poems in prose, Miss Constance Maud indulges in romance and paraphrase not a little, but the ethical teaching of the master is never obscured. We referred in dealing with her previous volume to the resemblance between her style and that adopted by Charles Lamb in his 'Tales from Shakspeare.' The likeness is maintained, but the language grows in exuberance. The characters are made to speak in language which is not Wagner's, however forcible it may be. Here is the description of the closing scene in 'Götterdämmerung':—

"Higher and yet higher in the glowing skies reached Loki's fiery arm; beyond the moon, beyond the farthest twinkling star, till it seized at last on the gods' splendid abode, the doomed Valhalla.....The only king who can withstand Death is Love—Love which is not quenched but purified by many waters, and emerges the brighter and stronger from the cleansing fire."

The seven illustrations by Mr. W. T. Maud are, like those of Mr. H. Granville Fell in the previous book, grotesque, but artistically executed. These books cannot fail to interest youthful musical students, and they are instructive as well as amusing.

Musical Gossip.

THE assertion that Herr Seidl will conduct the performances in German during the summer opera season at Covent Garden Theatre has received confirmation, and we shall doubtless hear M. Jean de Reszke as Siegfried, and his brother Édouard de Reszke as Wotan, both artists being spoken of in the highest terms in New York. Madame Melba was not a success as Brünnhilde, because her voice was too light and her style too undramatic for such a part. According to latest advices Madame Nordica was expected to do much better.

MADAME ANTOINETTE STERLING'S concert at St. James's Hall on Friday afternoon last week had a programme that included some high-class items. The popular mezzo-soprano sang lyrics by Schubert and Liszt; and Beethoven's Sonata in G for pianoforte and violin, Op. 96, was excellently played by Miss Fanny Davies and M. Johannes Wolff.

THE programme of the Queen's Hall Promenade Concert last Saturday evening commenced with a selection of three movements from Gounod's beautiful, but unjustly neglected semi-sacred opera 'Polyeucte,' and included also as novelties a suite arranged and newly orchestrated from Gluck's operas by Herr Felix Mottl, and a clever and effective 'Scène des Bacchanales' by Mr. Ernest Ford, from the ballet music written for 'Faust' at the Empire Theatre.

MR. ROBERT NEWMAN has now virtually completed the arrangements for the five concerts under Herr Felix Mottl at the Queen's Hall, on Tuesday evenings March 16th and 30th, April 13th, and May 11th and 18th. The first programme will consist of the "Development of the Overture," and will include examples by Handel, Gluck, Mozart, Beethoven, Weber, Mendelssohn, Berlioz, and Wagner. The last-named poet-composer will be very strongly represented at the remaining concerts, the items including the whole of the second scene from the second act of 'Parsifal' and the whole of the third act. Herr Vogl will appear at two concerts, and a choir of nearly two hundred voices will come to London for a performance of Beethoven's Choral Symphony on April 13th.

AT Sir Charles Halle's Manchester Concerts, on Thursday evening this week, Prof. Villiers Stanford's choral ballad 'The Revenge' and Dr. Hubert Parry's Miltonic ode 'Blest Pair of Sirens' were both performed for the first time in the Lancashire city, according to announcement, under the direction of Mr. F. H. Cowen, and Dvorák's ode 'The Spectre's Bride' was included in the programme.

THE Handel Society proposes to perform the oratorio of 'Susanna' at the People's Palace on the evening of Saturday, February 6th. The soloists will be Miss Gertrude Sichel (Susanna), Miss Muriel Foster (Joachim), Mr. Arthur Wills (Chelsias), Mr. Harry Stubbs (First Elder), and Mr. Francis Harford (Second Elder). Mr. J. S. Liddle will conduct, Mr. Croager will be the organist, and Dr. A. H. Mann, of King's College, Cambridge, has undertaken to fill in the accompaniments to the airs and recitatives on the piano.

THE choral rehearsals for the Birmingham Festival next October will commence in March. Among the novelties will be a Requiem Mass by Prof. Villiers Stanford.

MESSRS. GILBERT AND SULLIVAN'S amazingly successful comic opera 'The Mikado' has been played in various parts of Europe, but not hitherto in French. It is now, however, being adapted for performance in that language in Brussels.

PROF. VILLIERS STANFORD'S comic masterpiece in opera 'Shamus O'Brien' is meeting with much success in New York, which is not surprising, as the music is marked by freshness and beauty, the story is interesting, and the Irish colony in the American city is large and patriotic.

ENGLISH music is at last beginning to be recognized in Italy. A so-called "British Festival" is to be held at Rome during Easter under the direction of Mr. Albert Visetti. Sir Arthur Sullivan's 'Golden Legend,' Sir Alexander Mackenzie's 'Britannia' Overture, Prof. Villiers Stanford's 'Irish' Symphony, and compositions by Dr. Hubert Parry and Mr. F. H. Cowen are to be performed.

SIGNOR PUCCINI'S new opera on the gruesome subject of 'La Tosca' is not likely to be produced this year, though from no fault of the composer, as he has received the words of only the first act from his librettists, and of course, in accordance with modern art theories, continuity in the music of a lyric drama is as essential as consistency in the story. Hence a composer cannot proceed if the entire foundation is not before him.

THE Auckland Musical Society, New Zealand, has decided to produce very shortly Mr. Edward Elgar's cantata 'King Olaf,' first performed at Hanley in October last. The local papers mention the favourable opinions of the work given in the Athenæum, which may now be fully endorsed.

SO-CALLED "grand opera" seems to be in the ascendant in Cape Town. The local papers speak in the highest terms of Mr. Luscombe Searelle's company, and especially of Madame Fanny Moody and her husband, Mr. Charles Manners.

DRAMA

Dramatic Gossip.

IN the new play at the Avenue, the forthcoming production of which was first announced in the Athenæum, Mr. Forbes Robertson will personate Lord Nelson and Mrs. Patrick Campbell Lady Hamilton. There seems likely to be a run on commanders, military or naval.

'HIS LITTLE DODGE' was withdrawn from the Royalty on Saturday last, and Mr. Alexander's tenure of that theatre is presumably over.

AT the close of the season of Carl Rosa opera at the Garrick Mr. Justin H. McCarthy's alteration of 'My Friend from India,' a play by Mr. H. A. du Souchet, produced last month at Hoyt's Theatre in New York, will be given.

FOR the forthcoming production of Echegaray's 'Mariana,' in which Miss Elizabeth Robins will play the heroine, Mr. H. B. Irving has been engaged as the hero.

MR. ARTHUR ROBERTS will shortly reappear at the Prince of Wales's in a version by Mr. Arthur Sturgess of 'La Poupée,' a Parisian piece not likely to prove too tractable to the adapter.

A REPRESENTATION of Robertson's 'Society' was given yesterday afternoon for a benefit at the Criterion with Miss Rose Leclercq as Lady Ptarmigant, and Messrs. Kemble, Brookfield, Farquhar, Righton, and Eric Lewis in other parts.

THIS evening witnesses the reopening of the Lyceum with 'Cymbeline,' Miss Ellen Terry reappearing for one week as Imogen.

IN the forthcoming revival at the Lyceum of 'Olivia' Mr. Vezin will play Dr. Primrose. The adaptation of 'Madame Sans-Gêne,' which will follow at the same house, is by Mr. Comyns Carr.

THE assumption by Miss Hilda Spong of the part of Marion Thornton in 'Two Little Vagabonds' at the Princess's should give that admirably sympathetic play a new lease of life. This is the first time Miss Spong has done herself justice and shown herself to be what she obviously is, a pleasing and an accomplished artist, and a noteworthy addition to our rather insignificant list of actresses able to take the lead in sentimental drama. The first three acts of the melodrama should recommend it to all playgoers. Not below the average of melodrama are the two following acts, but the spectator, if he likes, may "cut" them. Miss Sydney Fairbrother and Miss Kate Tyndall remain delightful as the two children. The play is generally well acted, both in the serious and the comic characters, Mr. Lyston Lyle deserving special mention. It is not often that it is possible to speak so warmly of a piece of this class. As workmanship it is open to the charge of conventionality and crudeness, but it is informed with genuine sympathy, and in the early scenes is very moving.

AMONG the least satisfactory aspects of the stage must be counted the system by which new plays are mounted and produced by syndicates. Noways daunted are these bodies by the fact that one experiment after another ends in financial disaster, and in terrible hardship to the actors and subordinates of a theatre. It seems worth while to look for a moment at the conditions under which a play presented by a syndicate is put before the public. There are, let us say, in London a dozen loyally and competently managed theatres, every one of which is eager and clamorous for a piece that will justify it in incurring the cost of production. If then a play is produced by a syndicate, it is one which fails to commend itself to any of these managements. A syndicate has, as a rule, little experience and less money. It has rarely a chance of obtaining possession of a really popular house, nor can it often induce any leading actress to play the heroine. Having then secured a stage with a gloomy record of failure, it assigns some at least of the female characters to actresses without experience, or with too much, who can personally or vicariously bring a few score pounds into the venture. Supposing the piece to be vital enough (a thing very hard of acceptance) to survive an interpretation necessarily inferior to that at a first-class theatre, there is seldom money enough to enable the management to hold on unless the work itself pays "from hand to mouth." Yet the prices charged for admission to this vamped-up show are the same that are demanded for a well-ordered entertainment. Knowing the glamour that extends from the mimic presentation of human joys and sorrows over the boards themselves whereon these are exhibited, and even over the things connected with management that are almost necessarily sordid, we do not marvel at the constant succession of theatrical enterprises undertaken with scarcely a chance of success. When a complaint is heard, however, of the decline of the drama it may not be justified by any number of instances of plays like this. Plays by competent authors fail occasionally at well-managed theatres. The cases are few, however, in which the mishap is not traceable to some cause outside legitimate artistic and commercial speculation. The syndicate system generally brings disaster with it. It cannot honestly be said that it often deserves to succeed.

MISCELLANEA

Little Silverhair and the Three Bears. — Perhaps you will kindly grant space to an inquiry which, though it only relates to a nursery tale, I consider worthy of the attention of any person of literary and artistic tastes. The well-known 'Story of Little Silverhair and the Three Bears,' according to the index of a small and not very elegant book called, if I remember rightly, 'The Child's Companion,' was written by Southey. If so, I need no apology in asking, firstly, Is the tale really invented by Southey? or has he made use of traditional "folk-lore" in composing it? Secondly, Which is the proper interpretation to be put on the personal relationship of the three bears? All illustrations of the subject I have ever seen, even those by Walter Crane, represent them as a married couple with a child. This appears to me an unaccountable mistake. Ever since I heard the tale from "nurse," I never doubted that the three bears were bachelor brothers, and it seems evident from the words of the tale that the poet had the same idea. If the middle bear was a female, according to general custom she would have done the cooking alone, and would have been managing some other household affairs (probably washing the small bear's hands and combing his hair); instead of which we find these three jolly companions leaving their porridge to cool, and taking a walk together. Equality evidently was the foremost principle in their way of living. Why should the story continually dwell on the difference of size and voice if there were other and greater differences? And, lastly: the mysterious danger of the adventurous Little Silverhair is half taken away if the house of the Three Bears is represented as a perfectly well-regulated family mansion. I hope these arguments prove at least the possibility that my impression is the one the poet wished to convey.

"The 'collector of moderate means,' for whose special behoof the volumes of the Collector Series are designed, will take pleasure and find profit in the admirable guide to FINE PRINTS which MR. FREDERICK WEDMORE has written for MR. REDWAY. It maps out the ground for him who would go forth on the delightful quest of rare and beautiful etchings, line engravings, and mezzotints; and at every turn it gives him valuable hints and directions. 'Take money in thy purse is thought by some to be the chief if not the sole advice needed in such an enterprise. But MR. WEDMORE shows us how, by putting knowledge and taste in the place of the long purse, by eschewing the extravagant rarities only millionaires and museums need seek after, a man may, at a comparatively small expenditure, become the proud owner of a collection of prints, old and new, which are a delight and an art education to look at. Then his 'fad,' even if it be but a fad, has the recommendation of portability; 'the print-collector carries a museum in a portfolio, or packs away a picture gallery neatly within the compass of one solander box.' The author does not aim at any formal completeness in his survey of the masters of the arts of line engraving and etching and their characteristic works. Rather he shows the example as well as gives the advice of pursuing a special line; his criticisms, commentaries, and selections have the 'personal' touch which he rightly says should belong to fine prints; and he does not conceal that he has his 'prepossessions.' One enjoys and profits by the volume all the more rather than the less because it is not always possible to agree with its praises and its strictures. At the end there is a too brief note on woodcuts, of which MR. WEDMORE can only speak as an outsider; there is a bibliography of works on prints and print-collecting; and—certainly not the least attraction of the work—a charming series of a dozen examples of famous or typical etchings or engravings."—Scotsman, January 14.

The BIRDS of BERWICKSHIRE. By GEORGE MUIRHEAD, F.R.S.E. F.Z.S.

"The letterpress has evidently been prepared with great care; its style is excellent and scholarly; a vast amount of antiquarian and etymological research is displayed: its wealth of illustration—nearly every chapter or article having a beautifully etched vignette—makes it quite a drawing-room book; and altogether the work commends itself to a far wider circle than the mere ornithologist."—Ibis.

"To the collector of county bird books it will be especially acceptable, since it deals very completely with a portion of North Britain which to most naturalists has been hitherto a terra incognita."—Zoologist.

BIRDS FROM MOIDART and ELSEWHERE. Drawn from Nature by J. B. (Mrs. Hugh Blackburn).

"The book is to be as strongly recommended for the accuracy of its accounts and the interesting character of its anecdotes as for the artistic merit of its illustrations."—Field.

MR. FLINDERS PETRIE'S NEW PUBLICATIONS.

PETRIE (W. M. FLINDERS).—KOPTOS. With a Chapter by D. G. HOGARTH, M.A. 1 vol. 4to. 35 pp. 28 Plates (4 Photographic), boards, 10s.

—— NAQADA and BALLAS. By W. M. FLINDERS PETRIE and QUIBELL. With a Chapter by F. C. J. SPURRELL. 4to. 79 pp. 87 Plates, boards, 25s.

The district treated in this work is about thirty miles North of Thebes and on the Western side of the Nile. Messrs. Flinders Petrie and Quibell give decisive evidence of an hitherto unknown invasion of Upper Egypt, which is linked with the prehistoric civilization of the Mediterranean. An ample index adds greatly to the value of the book.

MR. ROBERT W. CHAMBERS'S NEW BOOK.

THE MAKER OF MOONS.

Illustrated. Crown 8vo. cloth extra, 6s.

New Saturday.—"This volume of short stories is written in a style which has the rare charm of novelty. Into most of the tales a supernatural element enters, but Mr. Chambers touches the mystical with so deft a hand that they appear almost credible to the most prosaic of readers."

Scotsman.—"A vigorous spirit, as well as a delicate art and a bold imagination, has gone to the making of these tales."

Daily Telegraph.—"We cannot for the moment recall to mind any latter-day collection of short tales in which vivacious fancy and subtle wit are so happily combined with constructive dexterity and descriptive force.....Everybody should read these delightful stories."

BY THE SAME AUTHOR.

THE RED REPUBLIC.

Crown 8vo. cloth, 6s.

Academy.—"'The Red Republic' is the most vivid certainly, and I think the most enthralling narrative of the evil days of the Commune which any romancist has given us."

THE KING AND A FEW DUKES.

Crown 8vo. 6s.

Academy.—"The fantastically extravagant narrative proceeds with unflagging verve, and indeed often with a charming suggestion of delicate style."

A FEW WORDS ABOUT THE

BLICKENSDERFER TYPE-WRITER.

It is NOT a reproduction or hash-up of any existing machines on which the patents have run out.

It is NOT an IMPROVEMENT on them.

It is an entirely new departure in Type-writer mechanism. The root idea in its construction is simplicity; in place of 2 to 3,000 parts it has only about 200. As a result of this simplicity we have a machine which is

PORTABLE (weight 6lb.), SPEEDY, DURABLE, and CHEAP.

It has a complete Key-board, with 84 Letters and Characters. It is fully warranted, and yet it is sold for

 The new Volume contains, for the first time in the history of BOOK PRICES CURRENT, a Subject Index of an extensive character; and a large number of entries, which seemed to stand in need of elucidation or explanation, have been carefully annotated, either Bibliographically or Historically, and collations of many of the books have also been given.

"The record is extremely useful for buyers and collectors of books, and is a valuable index to current phases of book-collecting and to fluctuations in the market."—Saturday Review.

"Valuable to booksellers and still more so to bookbuyers."—Athenæum.

"It will furnish a record of great use and interest to the bibliophile."—Notes and Queries.

"It will enable owners to know the market value of their possessions, which is often, in these days of the first edition craze, a great deal higher than the uninitiated would imagine."—Pall Mall Gazette.

VICTOR CHERBULIEZ'S NOVEL.

WITH FORTUNE MADE. Translated by M. E. Simkins. In cloth gilt, 6s.

"It would be well for English readers of French fiction if the novels of Victor Cherbuliez were as well known in England as are those of M. Zola." Daily Mail.

"M. Victor Cherbuliez is one of the most brilliant of modern French writers of fiction, and his novel 'With Fortune Made' has many claims to be translated into English. For one thing, there are several English and American characters in it; and, what is rarer in French novels, they are drawn with knowledge and without prejudice, although not without humour. Wrought out with unfailing wit and cleverness and knowledge of the world and of man." Scotsman.

LADY VIOLET GREVILLE'S NEW NOVEL.

The HOME for FAILURES. In cloth gilt, 3s. 6d.

"Lady Greville's best novel is 'The Home for Failures.' It is admirable, not only for the originality of the idea and the clear and spirited character drawing in the group of persons, but for the knowledge of people and things, the realism, the philosophy, and the feelings which find expression, frequently of an epigrammatic kind, in its pages. Everybody in the story is real."—World.

THE APOCALYPSE OF BARUCH.

TRANSLATED FROM THE SYRIAC.

BY

The Rev. R. H. CHARLES,
Author of 'The Book of Enoch,' &c.

Crown 8vo. cloth, price 7*s.* 6*d.* net.

"Mr. Charles's last work will have a hearty welcome from students of Syriac whose interest is linguistic, and from theological students who have learned the value of Jewish and Christian pseudepigrapha; and the educated general reader will find much of high interest in it, regard being had to its date and its theological standpoint."—Record.

"Mr. Charles has in this work followed up the admirable editions of other pieces of Apocalyptic literature with an edition equally admirable. Some of the notes on theological or other points of special interest are very full and instructive. The whole work is an honour to English scholarship. . . . The work before us is one that no future student of the Apocalyptic literature will be able to neglect, and students of the New Testament or the contemporary Jewish thought will find much to interest them in it."

Primitive Methodist Quarterly Review.

"Mr. Charles's name on the title-page of a book has come to be recognized as a hall-mark which guarantees ripe scholarship and keen critical acumen between the covers. Mr. Charles has condensed into his notes a wealth of information as to the current Jewish doctrines on such subjects, e. g., as inherited sin and immortality. It need hardly be said that these are of the highest value, so far as they indicate what religious axioms and postulates underlay the minds of the Apostles and their hearers."

British Weekly.

"To say that this is the edition of the Apocalypse of Baruch is to say nothing. Let us say that it is an edition which alone would give an editor a name to live."—Expository Times.

"It is a book that should be mastered by every student of the New Testament."

Westminster Review.

A NEW AND POPULAR

HISTORY OF ENGLAND AND THE BRITISH EMPIRE.

From B.C. 55 to A.D. 1890.

By EDGAR SANDERSON, M.A., late Scholar of Clare College, Cambridge.

"It is just the book for public elementary teachers to procure."—Guardian.

"Mr. Sanderson's narrative is comprehensive yet not diffuse, concise yet clear. It is also based on good authority, and well-arranged special chapters are given to our Asiatic and colonial Empires."—Globe.

"It has been left for Mr. Sanderson to tell the complete story—to embrace in a single volume our history down practically to the present moment, and to include in the narrative, in their proper places, those achievements abroad which built the existing British Empire."—Scotsman.

ADVENTURES of ROGER L'ESTRANGE. Edited by DOMINICK DALY. With Preface by H. M. STANLEY, M.P. 6*s*.

"Everything that a modern adventure story should possess is here. There is even a love interest so prettily developed and so entirely satisfactory that a hand of a Stevenson or a Crockett might have set it down. Fenimore Cooper has written no more convincing account of the horrors of Indian torture and imprisonment. The style is the style of Defoe with much of Defoe's simple charm."—Daily Chronicle.

DICTIONARY of QUOTATIONS (ENGLISH). By Colonel P. H. DALBIAC, M.P. Second Edition. Pp. 536, 8vo. 7*s*. 6*d*.

"An improvement upon Bartlett."—Times. "The fulness and accuracy of its references make it worthy of a place in every library where scholarship is valued."—Scotsman. "A distinct advance on all its predecessors."—Journal of Education. "Up to date and admirably explicit."—Pall Mall Gazette.

WITH FACSIMILE LETTER FROM THE EMPRESS OF RUSSIA.

The ANGEL PRINCESS (PRINCESS ALICE). By EDWARD W. DARBY. With 6 Plates by F. C. Tilney. Imperial 16mo. gilt leatherette, gilt edges, in box, 5*s*.

"To have written it you must have many recollections of my mother."—ALIX, PRINCESS OF HESSE.

SIDE LIGHTS on SHAKSPERE. With Two Illustrations. By L. ROSSI and E. M. CORBOULD. Crown 8vo. cloth, 3*s*. 6*d*.

Contents:—Shakspere and his Sonnets—A Midsummer Night's Dream—King Richard II.—The Merchant of Venice—King Henry V.—As You Like It—Julius Cæsar—Hamlet, Prince of Denmark—Macbeth—King Henry VIII.—Index.

"The object of the writers has been to supply the information required by students preparing for examination, and to present it in a form sufficiently attractive to appeal also to the general reader. The plays are those most frequently selected for study in schools, and the details usually relegated to notes and appendices will be found incorporated in the text." Extract from Preface.

'TOM JONES' FOR FAMILY READING.

TOM JONES: the History of a Foundling. By Henry FIELDING. Adapted for Family Reading by his Great-Granddaughter, J. E. M. FIELDING. 6*s*.

"Miss Fielding has performed a useful service in preparing an expurgated 'Tom Jones.' Fielding is thus for the first time made accessible to an important section of the reading public. The volume preserves the spirit while preserving the very language of the author. Had Fielding lived it is no great feat of imagination to fancy his doing for himself what has been so successfully done by his descendant."—Daily Chronicle.

The FARM in the KAROO: a Sketch of South African Life. By Mrs. CAREY-HOBSON. Illustrated. 2*s*. 6*d*.

FERDINAND LASSALLE and HELENE von DONNIGES. A Modern Tragedy. By ELIZABETH E. EVANS. Paper boards, 1*s*.

WORKS BY

WALTER SWEETMAN, B.A.

"THE PHILOSOPHY OF COMMON SENSE"

may be perhaps condensed into the two propositions that to love God is to love all perfection as the human soul has been created to recognize perfection, and that to love perfection in so far as it has been given to each soul to recognize perfection, is to love God. It suggests that the best parts of the systems of Plato and Buddha harmonize with Christianity, and affirms that the latter teaches us that God judges with his eternal judgment all men equally by their own consciences. It would prove the truth of Christianity by showing that it shares with Materialism alone the power of giving reasonable explanations of the distribution of pain through the world, and that Materialism can be proved to be unsound; and again by pointing out how the two great à priori arguments, that self-sacrifice is a part of perfection, and that if God came on earth but once to teach us it must be part of His own perfection to have left a firm guardian of that teaching, are borne out by the à posteriori reasonings that tend to establish that Christ was God, and that He did die for men, and did leave a Church founded on the Apostle whose name was changed. It suggests again that it is a quite conceivable hypothesis that the external world is but the framework given to the human will by Him "in whom we live and move and have our being," and existing only in the sensations of immortal spirits, while it is quite inconceivable to us how the instincts that supply bees with their sex-conferring jellies, and spiders with their wonderful adaptations of web-making, can be contained, on materialistic or any atomic principles, in the reproductive cells or their eggs. Finally, by the plain facts that faith is a supernatural gift of God, and that no Christian can prove more than a probability for his religion, it at once explains how the mere love of (eternal) pleasure and dread of pain are not intended to do the full work of loyal trust, and the love of truth and goodness for their own sakes, and takes away all excuse for forming those uncharitable opinions of the consciences of others that have so sadly disfigured historical Christianity.

LIBERTAS; or, from Dreamland to Truth. 3 vols. 6*s.* each.

"Mr. Sweetman writes with a considerable degree of literary skill."—Scotsman.

"'Through the Night,' which occupies the whole of the first volume, is a really bright Irish story."—Spectator.

"Mr. Sweetman is earnest and thoughtful."—Standard.

The REIGN of PERFECTION: Letters on a Liberal Catholic Philosophy. 3*s.* 6*d.* [Just out.

"Under this heading Walter Sweetman, B.A., has compiled a number of letters on a liberal Catholic philosophy, which, with the splendid introduction which accompanies them, should become a valuable and valued book."
Western Daily Mercury.

"Mr. Sweetman is, however, 'a Liberal Catholic,' and we hope to hear more of him."—Methodist Times.

"There are portions of this little book so good and so suggestive that we could wish that the author was not under the banner of Liberal Catholicism.....He sometimes says things that are excellent, and occasionally things that are beautiful."—Dublin Review.

CHATTO & WINDUS'S NEW BOOKS.

A NEW "TIMES NOVEL."

Mrs. B. M. CROKER'S New Novel, BEYOND the PALE: an Irish Romance, is now ready at all Booksellers'. Crown 8vo. buckram, 6s.

Mr. G. A. HENTY'S New Novel, The QUEEN'S CUP, is now ready in 3 vols. at every Circulating Library.

"Mr. George Henty's new story, 'The Queen's Cup,' may be idiomatically described as 'taking the cake' in respect to the variety and sensational character of the adventures recorded in its pages."—Daily Telegraph.

"A healthy and vigorous story of adventure, full of fighting and cruising, with a good dash of love-making thrown in, is a gift which one can always reckon upon from Mr. G. A. Henty. 'The Queen's Cup' thoroughly fulfils the description. Captain Mallett is a frank and brave and manly fellow; Bertha Greendale is all that one expects in a heroine in the matter of pluck and good looks, and has more sense than the most."—Scotsman.

WILLIAM WESTALL'S New Novel, WITH the RED EAGLE: a Romance of the Tyrol, is now ready at all Booksellers'. Crown 8vo. cloth gilt, 6s.

"A plain story of fighting and adventure, vigorously and effectively told in terse and manly English. The historical and the purely romantic interest are very judiciously mingled, and grow as the narrative proceeds. One seldom comes upon a more successful or satisfactory essay in the department of historical romance."—Scotsman.

FRANK BARRETT'S New Novel, A MISSING WITNESS, will be ready on February 4. With 8 Illustrations by W. H. Margetson. Crown 8vo. cloth, 3s. 6d.

GEORGE R. SIMS'S Novel, ROGUES and VAGABONDS, will be ready in a New Edition on February 4. Crown 8vo. cloth, 3s. 6d.

Mrs. HUNGERFORD'S New Volume of Stories, An ANXIOUS MOMENT, is now ready at all Booksellers'. Crown 8vo. cloth, 3s. 6d.

CYNTHIA: a Daughter of the Philistines. By Leonard Merrick, Author of 'This Stage of Fools.' 2 vols. crown 8vo. 10*s.*; and at all Circulating Libraries.

"Good conscience is not Mr. Merrick's only qualification for his art; he has all sorts of others—observation, knowledge of life, humour, a turn for neat phrasing, an eye for the essential, and a clear recognition of development as a factor in human character. All these, and some others, he has brought to bear upon the writing of 'Cynthia,' with the not unnatural result that one sits through the story with very genuine pleasure, and rises from the reading of it with indubitable refreshment.....Mr. Merrick's real triumph is his portrayal of the development of Cynthia. This is an exceptionally fine and artistic piece of work."—Daily Chronicle.

The NARRATIVE of CAPTAIN COIGNET, Soldier of the Empire, 1776–1850. Edited from the Original MS. by LOREDAN LARCHEY, and Translated by Mrs. M. CAREY. With 100 Illustrations. Crown 8vo. cloth, 3*s.* 6*d.*

"This is a long book, but every page of it is worth reading.....His account of the retreat from Moscow has the vivid realism and primal freshness which were to be looked for in the narrative of one who had taken part in it; and we get, in passing, many glimpses of the great Napoleon as he appeared to the eye of one of his loyal and admiring followers. Although merely the literal record of a veteran soldier's experiences, the book is as fascinating as a romance."—Daily Mail.

MY FIRST BOOK. By Sir Walter Besant, James Payn, W. Clark Russell, Grant Allen, Hall Caine, George R. Sims, Rudyard Kipling, A. Conan Doyle, M. E. Braddon, F. W. Robinson, H. Rider Haggard, R. M. Ballantyne, I. Zangwill, Morley Roberts, D. Christie Murray, Marie Corelli, J. K. Jerome, John Strange Winter, Bret Harte, "Q," Robert Buchanan, and R. L. Stevenson. With 185 Illustrations. A New Edition. Small demy 8vo. art linen, 3*s.* 6*d.*

"It was a stroke of genius on Mr. Jerome's part to suggest such a topic as 'My First Book.' This inspiration may one day come to be regarded as his great service to literature.....It is indeed a remarkable—nay, a unique—portrait-gallery that Mr. Jerome has brought together. 'Autobibliography' Mr. Zangwill pleasantly calls his article; but it and the rest are much more than that. They are really 'autoportraiture.' More entertaining utterances than most of these twenty-two papers it would be hard to conceive; but they are more than entertaining—they are valuable."—Daily Chronicle.

EUROPE IN THE MIDDLE AGE.

By OLIVER J. THATCHER, Ph.D., and FERDINAND SCHWILL, Ph.D.

Existing histories of the Middle Age, upon which so much light has been thrown by the researches of recent years, are either general in their outlines or devoted to certain phases of the subject at the expense of others. This work aims at completeness and comprehensiveness, at the same time studying conciseness in detail by a thorough system of classification.

GOD: the Creator and Lord of All.

By Professor SAMUEL HARRIS D.D. LL.D., Yale University. Author of 'The Philosophical Basis of Theism,' 'The Self Revelation of God.' 2 vols. post 8vo. 16*s*.

"In this work Professor Harris developes the principle that the idea of God is not attained by mere subjective thinking, but that God is known through His action revealing Himself in the constitution and evolution of the universe and in the constitution and history of man issuing in Christ, and in the Holy Spirit bringing gracious Divine influence on men.

Summary of Contents.—Part I. God the one only Absolute Spirit. II. God the Creator—The Creation—God's Chief End in Creation. III. God the Lord of all in Providential Government. IV. God the Lord of all in Moral Government.

DR. PLUMMER ON S. LUKE'S GOSPEL.

A CRITICAL and EXEGETICAL

COMMENTARY on S. LUKE'S GOSPEL. By Rev. ALFRED PLUMMER, D.D., Master of University College, Durham. Post 8vo. (pp. 678), 12*s*.

"Being the Fifth Volume of "The INTERNATIONAL CRITICAL COMMENTARY."

"Dr Plummer's work is, it need hardly be said, admirably done both in the introduction and in the commentary. Readers will peruse with pleasure his treatment of the leading characteristics of the Gospel. The linguistic analysis leaves nothing to be desired."—Record.

RECENTLY DISCOVERED MANU-

SCRIPTS, and ORIGEN'S COMMENTARIES on MATTHEW and JOHN. Being an Additional Volume to the "Ante-Nicene Christian Library." Edited by Prof. ALLAN MENZIES, D.D., St. Andrews University. 1 vol. 4to. (pp. 540), 12*s*. 6*d*. net.

"Notwithstanding the undoubted wonder of the archæological finds of recent years, the greatest wonder, and the greatest number in the way of 'finds,' is in the region of Early Christian literature. Some of these finds made nothing short of a sensation when they came; but their value was great enough to outlive it. Now, all these Early Christian works have been gathered together, translated by competent scholars and edited by Professor Menzies. Those of us who, at much labour and some expense gathered editions and translations of these many works as they appeared will grudge the labour now. For this is better in every individual case, having profited by all the books that went before, and it is most convenient to have them all in one."

BOOK SALES of the YEAR 1896.

Containing a Detailed Description of all the most important Books Sold at Auction, with the Names of the Purchasers, and the Prices realized. With Complete Indexes of Names and Subjects, and General Introduction and Notes. By TEMPLE SCOTT.

NOTE.—The special features which last year earned for this work a welcome reception from bibliographers, book-collectors, and booksellers will be continued in the present volume. In addition to the usual notes, there will be many collations of rarer items, and a subject as well as author index. A new feature entirely is the arrangement of each sale in alphabetical order. It has not been possible to give the purchasers' names in every case, but the instances of omission are not many. The editor claims that the record he presents is not a mere reprint of the catalogues of the auctioneers, but constitutes a practical guide for the book-collector, as well as an important record for the bibliographer.

The Publishers reserve to themselves the right of raising the price after publication. A few copies of the volume for 1895 are still on hand, and may be had for 15*s*. net each.

Pickle the Spy. By Andrew Lang. (Longmans & Co.)

"You know that your cousin Duncan, the late Glengarry, succeeded his uncle Alexander, one of the best men in the Highlands in his day, possessing eminently all the virtues of a Cean Cuine, whose hospitable mansion was ever open, as his assistance to distress was ever ready. But, alas! like too many of our clan, he was cut off in the prime of life, to the great grief of his family, and while he was busy in promoting the happiness of his people, as his worthy ancestor, Lord Macdonald of Aras, had done before him."

We quote from a scarce work, unknown apparently to Mr. Lang, 'A Family Memoir of the Macdonalds of Keppoch,' by Angus Macdonald, M.D. (1752–1825), of Taunton, written from 1800 to 1820 for his niece, Mrs. Stanley Constable, and edited by Clements R. Markham, C.B.; with some notes by the late Charles Edward Stuart, Comte d'Albanie (London, 150 copies, 1885). The "cousin Duncan" of the quotation was father to Scott's friend Alastair Macdonell, the prototype of "Fergus Mac-Ivor"; and "his uncle Alexander, one of the best men in the Highlands in his day," was—Mr. Lang's Pickle the Spy.

Alastair Ruadh Macdonell was the eldest of the four sons of Ian or John Macdonell, twelfth of Glengarry, and the grandson of Alastair Dubh, Black Alister, whose mighty two-handed sword mowed down two redcoats with every stroke at Killiecrankie, and who fought, too, at Sheriffmuir. Young Alastair had already held a captain's commission in the French Scots brigade when in May, 1745, he sailed from Port Glasgow to France with "a pacquet subscrib'd by several of the Highland chiefs, and desiring the Prince not to make an attempt at that time without foreign assistance." His father, four months before, had disponed his lands to him, and, whilst lamenting to Duncan Forbes "the folly of his friends," sent out three hundred of the clan under his second son Æneas (1726–1746), who, shot accidentally at Falkirk, was buried by Prince Charles Edward in the grave of Sir John the Graeme, "Vallæ fidus Achates"—the trusty Achates of Wallace. Alastair mean time, while conveying troops from France to Scotland, was captured on the high seas, and imprisoned in the Tower for twenty-two months. Released in July, 1749, he returned to Paris, and thence wrote to "James III." and the Cardinal Duke of York, protesting loyalty and craving "suitable encouragement." He was in London again in 1749 and 1751; in Rome in 1750, when he had audience with "his Majesty"; and in 1752 both in London and in Edinburgh, when he "did" Bishop Forbes "the honour to dine with" him at Leith. He was once so hard up that he had to sell sword and shoe-buckles, but at other times he seems to have been in funds; and his father dying September 1st, 1754, he straightway came north and succeeded him. But not for long; he himself died September 23rd, 1761. That is pretty much all that was known about Young Glengarry, except that he should have been a good Catholic, for in 1750 he was "an ardent suitor" to Cardinal York "for a relick of the precious wood of the Holy Cross, in obtaining which I shall think myself most happy." His portrait in Highland dress, prefixed here as a frontispiece, now hangs at Balgownie; it shows him "a handsome, fair, athletic young chief, with a haughty expression. Behind him stands a dark, dubious-looking retainer, like an evil genius."

And now Mr. Lang comes forward, and identifies this gallant young chief with an infamous spy, who, under the aliases of "Jeanson" (son of Ian or John), "Alexr. Jeanson," "Alexr. Jackson," "Roderick Random," and specially "Pickle," was in correspondence with the Hanoverian Government from November 2nd, 1752, and probably earlier, until February 19th, 1760. This spy prates much of his "upright intentions," his "candour," his "attachment to the best of Sovereigns," and his "reale zeale for the service of his King and Country": for 500*l.* a year he is willing to do anything "honourable"—he did send his friend Dr. Archibald Cameron to the gallows. And Young Glengarry at the same time writes to Edgar:—

"You'l at same time assure his Majesty of my constant resolution to venture my owne person, let the consequence be what it will and dow everything that can convince his Majesty of my Dutifull attachmt to his sacred person and Royal Cause, for which I am ready to Venture my all, and nothing but the hand I had in those leate and present Schemes, and the frequent jants I was oblidged to take in Consequence, Has hindered me from beeing settled in a very advantagious and honorable way."

We have italicized five misspelt words; just so misspells Pickle the Spy. Yes, that is one of Mr. Lang's fifteen grounds of identification, thus succinctly advanced in his letter to the Scotsman of January 16th, in answer to an indignant "Highlander from Fort Augustus":—

"(1) Pickle and Glengarry have both been officers in the French army; (2) Both (and no other Highland chief) were King James's managers in London about 1751; (3) Both (and no other Highland chief) were in the Elibank Plot of 1752; (4) Both were ill in Paris in February, 1753; (5) Both (and no other chief known to us) were in the entourage of the Prince (1752–1754), and very intimate with the Earl Marischal in Paris; (6) Both were sons and heirs of a great chief; (7) Both succeeded him in autumn, 1754 (when Old Glengarry died, and no other great chief died); (8) Both visited their Highland estates in autumn, 1754; (9) Both had lands on the west coast, where arms might be landed; (10) Pickle virtually claims the Macdonells as his clan; (11) Both (and nobody else in these documents) [always] spell 'Who' as 'How'; (12) Both, in my opinion, write identical hands, though this opinion 'is not evidence'; (13) Glengarry is said, on Pelham's authority, to have offered himself for sale just when we know that Glengarry was starving; (14) Pickle asks that an answer to his letter of February 19th, 1760, may be directed, not 'to So-and-So, care of Macdonell of Glengarry,' but 'to Alexander Macdonell of Glengarry'; (15) Glengarry dies, and Pickle's letters cease."

As to No. 12, facsimiles of the two handwritings should certainly have been furnished; but taken collectively, in some cases almost singly, these fifteen proofs appear to us damning, irresistible. Difficulties there are, beyond question, and Mr. Lang has not always faced them, but they are capable of explanation. For instance, on p. 290 Pickle writes of Glengarry in the third person: "Glengary, into whose confidence I have greatly insinuated myself .....as I was informed in the greatest confidence by this Gentilman." It is puzzling, but, by preconcerted arrangement with his correspondent, he may have done this purposely to throw off the scent any third person into whose hands his letters might fall. That at least is far easier to suppose than that one of Glengarry's retainers (say the "evil genius" of the portrait) could have personated him, and for years imposed successfully on the Hanoverian Government. Mr. R. L. Stevenson, to whom transcripts of Pickle's letters were sent for use in a novel, might, we conceive, have hit upon some such solution. Some such we would welcome ourselves; but, no, it will not do, it is impossible. The name of Glengarry must henceforth be more abhorred than that of Murray of Broughton, and one knows the abhorrence in which he was held by that hard-headed lawyer Scott's father. For Murray sold his friends' lives to save his own neck; Glengarry did so merely to line his sporran. There was a work announced lately on 'Death Masks.' Mr. Lang has unmasked a dead traitor, who has lain unsuspected in his Highland grave for close upon seven score years. It was right it should be done, and he has done it well. But the news of the shameful discovery will bring sorrow and heartburning to many in Scotland, and to more in the new Glengarry beyond the seas.

The interest of the work centres for the reader supremely in Pickle, but it contains much else that is both new and curious. It lifts for the first time the thick veil of mystery that hitherto has hung over Prince Charles's movements from February, 1749, for nearly eighteen years; during much of this time he was hiding in the alcove of a Paris convent, where, "unseen and unknown, he enjoyed every day the conversation of the most distinguished society, and heard much good and much evil spoken of himself." It tells us what books he read: among them 'Tom Jones,' 'Joseph Andrews,' 'Athalie,' 'Clarissa,' and Wood and Dawkins's 'Ruins of Palmyra.' Jemmy Dawkins, joint-author of that stately folio, was, it appears, an active Jacobite emissary, as also was Carte, the historian; and Frederick the Great was in 1753 intriguing busily with Dawkins. So, Carlyle notwithstanding, "the Cham of Tartary" did "interfere in the Bangorian controversy." Then we get glimpses of the Polish Princesse de Talmond, the unworthy Flora Macdonald of the Prince in his later wanderings, and, unlike Flora, his mistress. She was elderly (ten years his senior) and jealous, the object of her jealousy being poor Mlle. Luci Ferrand, who died in the autumn of 1752, and of whom we would fain hear more, for the little told of her is all of it lovable. Montesquieu figures often, once playfully offering to secure Charles a seat in the French Academy; and so does that meaner, at least humbler spy than Glengarry, James Mohr Macgregor, the father of Catriona. Of him we hear last from Paris in 1754, when he writes to Balhaldie, praying "a loan of the pipes, that he may play some melancholy tunes." But were we to cite all that the book has of interest, we should have to cite most of its three hundred pages. "Strafford," on p. 134, is a misprint for Stafford; "1740," on p. 78, should be 1746; and the treasure buried at Loch Arkaig was, we believe, 27,000, not 40,000, louis d'or—15,000 buried near the head of the lake, and 12,000 near its foot. So says Murray of Broughton, and on this point, at least, he seems to be worthy of credence.

History of English Literature. By Bernhard ten Brink. Vol. III. (Bell & Sons.)

THIS the third, and, alas! the final, volume of Dr. ten Brink's excellent work is not unworthy of its predecessors, which is as much as to say that it is of real value to all students of English literature.

As everybody — even the schoolboy — knows, the name of English literature handbooks is legion. But, indeed, few of this host are of any importance; few show any independent research or any original criticism. For the most part they are as sheep following shepherds, who often themselves know little of the country to be traversed. They have mouths and speak, but they speak only what they hear or think they hear somebody else say; and eyes have they, but they see nothing but what another person points out. And it is wonderful how they go on repeating a blunder that has once been well started. A statement once confidently made in some accepted volume is reiterated with yet greater confidence by these second-hand authorities — second-hand, or haply third, or *n*th. "Theirs not to reason why, theirs but" to make a book. Thus no progress is made.

And yet the amount of material for a fresh history of our literature accumulated during the last thirty years is enormous. And surely it is time that literary historiographers should avail themselves of it. We hope, at all events, that the ordinary manual-makers will, for the present at least, adopt Dr. ten Brink's volumes as their quarry, for the said volumes can be heartily recommended for several qualities not too often found in combination. In the first place they exhibit solid and accurate learning; along with this solidity and this accuracy they show both breadth and depth of view, and lastly a considerable gift of expression and exposition. In other words, to speak very moderately, they are well informed, they are intelligent and judicious, they are readable. The letter does not kill the spirit, as is so often the case; nor, on the other hand, does the spirit kill the letter, as is sometimes the case. Ten Brink is minutely exact without being pedantic or for a moment fancying that exactness is an end in itself. Amidst endless details to which he pays careful attention, he never forgets larger and wider considerations. He describes conscientiously the outside of things, but he fully understands that it is the mind, and not merely the body or the costume of his authors, that is his ultimate concern. It is deeply to be regretted that work so many-sided and so well instructed on so many sides should not have been carried on further, though, probably enough, the later periods of our literature would and could not have received so satisfactory a treatment as the earlier. It concludes with the death of the Earl of Surrey; and to the accomplished scholar so sadly and suddenly taken away from his great undertaking and his brilliant success we may, with a very slight change, fitly apply his own closing words, for indeed they have a strange propriety:—

"Surrey's tragic end in the flower of vigorous manhood was an immense loss to English poetry. Great things he might still have accomplished; but what he did accomplish has not been lost to posterity,"— an application which had occurred to us before we were aware that it had occurred also to Dr. Brandl—no doubt a generally obvious application.

The German edition of this last volume came out in the same year in which its distinguished author died, in 1892, under the supervision of Dr. Alois Brandl, one of Ten Brink's literary executors. Up to the end of the fourth chapter of Book VI. the MS. was left ready for the press. The remainder—two chapters—was found carefully arranged, and, though unpaged, complete, except "two blank leaves which Dr. Brandl has filled in to the best of his ability" (see pp. 211 and 212 of the English version).

The translation is the work of Miss Dora Schmitz, a well-practised and highly competent German and English scholar, docta "sermones utriusque linguæ." For the most part it runs well; now and then we are conscious that we are reading a reproduction, or something not quite natural and idiomatic. Thus to say that a certain stanza of Surrey's reminds one "of Middle-English sounds" is scarcely a proper use of "sounds." But when on the whole what had to be done is so well done, although not so easy to do, we are by no means minded to complain, nor should be so even if there were grounds for any serious complaint, which there are not. Just one thing is to be regretted, and this is that the text of the poems quoted in their English form—Ten Brink gives them in German—has not been more carefully corrected. Thus on p. 250 Surrey is credited with the claudicant line:—

> The fishes with new repaired scale,

the verb "float" being omitted. On the next page we have

> In longest night, or in longest day;
> In clearest sky, or where the clouds thickest be,

instead of

> In longest night, or in the longest day;
> In clearest sky, or where clouds thickest be.

And in the next extract "that" in l. 5 makes nonsense; it should be than. On p. 246:—

> Alas! now drencheth my sweet foe,
> That with the spoil of my heart did go,
> And left me; but alas! why did he go?

That second "go" should of course be so. "Aber ach! weshalb that er das?" Ten Brink has it; but the reader of poetry—or indeed of prose—does not wish to correct the press for himself: he likes to have it corrected. Elsewhere our eye is caught by "the Norwegian mariner Ohthern," "Ososius," "Honsdon," "Dundas" (for Dunbar). In the second edition of this very valuable volume, which surely will soon be wanted, we trust these errata will be assiduously removed. It would be absurd to say that such flies make the apothecary's ointment malodorous, but they certainly make it less attractive.

A Record of the Buddhist Religion as practised in India and the Malay Archipelago (A.D. 671–695). By I-tsing. Translated by J. Takakusu, B.A., Ph.D. With a Letter from Prof. F. Max Müller. (Oxford, Clarendon Press.)

ALL students of Indian history are aware of our indebtedness to Chinese sources of information for supplementing those fragmentary notices, pieced together from the evidence of coins and inscriptions, which, in the almost entire absence of trustworthy written records, form our chief authorities for the mediæval history of India. The most important of these sources are the records left of their travels by those Chinese pilgrims who visited India in the interests of Buddhism. The narrative of Hiuen Tsang has thrown much light on the period of Indian history of which he wrote, while adding some important details to our knowledge of those countries which he visited. Scarcely less valuable is the information supplied by I-tsing, another Buddhist pilgrim whom we find visiting India, in his 'Record of the Buddhist Religion as practised in India and the Malay Archipelago,' now made accessible to English readers through the labours of Mr. J. Takakusu.

It was at the age of eighteen that I-tsing formed the plan of visiting India, but he was thirty-seven before he was able to carry it out. The intervening years had been devoted to diligent study of the Buddhist Scriptures, five years being exclusively given to the Vinaya, that portion relating to monastic life and discipline. These studies probably fostered his wish to visit India, for we find him starting thither with the definite intention of studying the Vinaya doctrines in the land of their birth in order to combat the errors which had crept into the Chinese practice of them.

Leaving China in the year 671, I-tsing broke his journey at Bhoja, which has been identified with Palembang in Sumatra. Here he stayed six months, studying Sanskrit, after which he sailed northward, and landing at Tāmralipti, on the Hugli, went from there to Nālanda, where he lived ten years, gathering no doubt, both through study and personal experience, the materials for his future work.

Prof. Max Müller was the first to point out the importance of I-tsing's work for the history of Indian literature. To him we owe the publication as far back as the year 1880 of some of the more important chronological data yielded by I-tsing's record; and in a prefatory letter to the translator he again discusses at length the extent of I-tsing's contribution towards the settlement of Indian literary dates.

With regard to earlier authors mentioned by the pilgrim, we can expect, as the Professor remarks, but little aid. The dates of Pāṇini and Paṭañjali as fixed by the latest research receive, therefore, no confirmation from his incidental notices of them. The case is the same with those various names occurring in his work which belong to the earlier period of Indian literary history. As to Dharmakīrti, Mr. Takakusu shows that the interpretation of the passage referring to him which represents him as a contemporary of I-tsing is somewhat misleading. For the rendering of the French translator "parmi nos contemporains," he would substitute "of late years"—a reading which would meet Prof. Vasiliev's view that all the pilgrim wished to intimate was that Dharmakīrti and the group of authors named along with him were nearest to I-tsing in time. This interpretation of the passage, it may be noted, would not preclude the possibility of that theory being correct which places Dharmakīrti before Subandhu, on the strength of the quotations made from his writings in the latter's 'Vāsavadattā' (see Jour. Bom. Br. R. As. Soc., xviii. 88, 147).

I-tsing gives us, however, fixed dates for two famous literary names of the seventh century. These are Bhartṛihari, author of a commentary on Paṭañjali's 'Mahābhāshya,' who died, according to I-tsing's account, in A.D. 651 or 652, and Jayāditya, joint author with Vāmana of the 'Kāś'ikā Vṛitti,' whose death took place in A.D. 661 or 662. To have set at rest a question so disputed as the date of the 'Kāś'ikā' is a matter of no small importance, since its author Vāmana has been referred conjecturally to almost every century in the Christian era save the one to which he is now proved to have belonged.

For the student of Buddhism the value of I-tsing's narrative lies in the comprehensive and detailed description which it gives of the Buddhist monastic discipline prevalent in India during the seventh century A.D. The record is divided into a series of chapters dealing with the rules of conduct to be observed in the daily life of the śramana. These rules touch nearly every possible sphere of his activity, and determine to the minutest degree his behaviour under given circumstances. The bulk of them are sanitary in their nature, and have as their object the fostering of habits of cleanliness among the monks. Of such are the elaborate rules laid down for the care of the teeth, the cleansing of the mouth and hands, the directions as to food, and the vessels in which it is served; while the strict injunctions as to straining and filtering water, though ostensibly framed for the protection of insect life, are not without their sanitary significance in a country like India. I-tsing's graphic account of the variations between the Upavasatha ceremonies as practised in India and those in vogue in the islands of the Southern Sea is instructive as exemplifying that tendency to depart from the simplicity and purity of its earlier teaching which a system undergoes when introduced among a less civilized race. Even in India we see traces of deterioration in the worship paid to the Buddha, in the importance attached to meritorious actions as securing a satisfactory future life, and in the prevalence of more luxurious habits than characterized the early Buddhist community.

Of the growth of ritual and the development of the priestly power I-tsing's pages give ample testimony. According to his theory, the obligations of the laity towards the priesthood did not stop at the mere feeding and clothing of them, but extended to self-sacrifice of the extremest type. While repudiating self-mortification on the part of the śramana, he naïvely suggests that such passages in the Sūtras as inculcate it were meant for the laity, in whom it was meritorious if practised in the interests of the monks.

I-tsing's work, if carefully studied, will be found to yield some data for the student of the history and folk-lore of the time, being as valuable for the side-lights it throws on these as for the direct contributions it makes to them. Especially interesting are the chapters on the treatment of illness, revealing as they do the primitive physiological ideas of the age and the knowledge then current of the plants and herbs useful as remedies. Here and there are traces of methods of cure suggesting survivals from an earlier stage of culture—as, for instance, the mention of animal excrement used for medical purposes. In these chapters, as throughout the book, we catch glimpses of that system of popular belief, derived from a prehistoric age, which forms so large a part of all religious creeds, and, though modified by the developments of a later age, but rarely yields entirely to them. The belief in demoniacal possession, in the efficacy of spells and charms, the practice of offering the leavings of food to the spirits of the departed, are a few instances among others that will occur to the reader.

In the explanatory remarks, observations, and criticisms interspersed through the record we get a pleasant glimpse of the narrator himself. He seems to have been a man endowed with a fair share of shrewd common sense, exemplified in the wholesome advice he gives as to the use of judgment and reason in the carrying out of the various rules laid down by the Vinaya canon, and in his ability to distinguish between the letter and the spirit of a law—a power often lacking in the religious mind. His practical remarks on illness and its cure are full of sound sense; while his frankly expressed belief in over-eating as the most frequent cause of disorder, and his advocacy of fasting as a remedy for most diseases, might be taken to heart by a good many people of the present day with good results to themselves, though possibly not to the pockets of their doctors. There is a special charm about I-tsing's account of his teachers, to the eulogy of whom he devotes the last chapters of his work. These are full of exquisite little touches revealing the sensitive spirit of the narrator, and his keen appreciation of the character of the men who had so deeply influenced his life. Could anything be more natural or touching than the description he gives of his teacher striving in the stillness of the evening to comfort his lonely little pupil, finding sermons on a fleeting existence in the quickly fading autumn leaves, that he might divert the boy from his intense longing for his mother?

In a notice like the present it is impossible to do more than touch upon the most salient features of such a book; but perhaps enough has been said to show its value for the history of Indian Buddhism and Indian literature. That it is of no less importance for its bearings on the study of Chinese Buddhism the translator himself points out. The reader has reason to be grateful to Mr. Takakusu for the careful way in which he has done his work, for the valuable notes he has given in elucidation of doubtful passages or allusions, as well as for the map exhibiting so clearly the route by which I-tsing reached India. It may be well to draw attention to one slight slip which has come under notice. In a footnote on p. xxviii of his general introduction Mr. Takakusu, quoting from a review of Dr. Edkins's 'Chinese Buddhism' (Athen. July 3rd, 1880), speaks of Śīlāditya, i.e., Harshavardhana of Kananj, as receiving the Syrian Christians, Alopen and his companions, in A.D. 639, and argues from this that Alopen after visiting China must have returned to India. Mr. Takakusu seems, however, to have misread the passage quoted by the reviewer from Dr. Edkins's work, in which the reference is most distinctly to the Emperor of China, no allusion being made to Harshavardhana at all.

The Tudor Translations.—The History of Don Quixote of the Mancha. Translated by Thomas Shelton. With Introductions by J. Fitzmaurice-Kelly. 4 vols. (Nutt.)

MR. HENLEY has done a service to literature by including in the handsome series of "Tudor Translations" Shelton's version of 'Don Quixote'; for, in spite of its inaccuracies, it affords a better idea of the spirit of the original than any of its successors, and it is superior to the translations published on the Continent in the seventeenth century, except Franciosini's. Mr. Fitzmaurice-Kelly, too, has deserved well of students of Cervantes by reprinting the first part from the rare quarto of 1612, which differs in some respects from that of 1620. A comparison of the two is decidedly interesting. Several passages in the opening chapters have been altered in the second edition, generally for the worse, and some of them for the better; but after a little the reviser, whoever he was, appears to have grown weary, and the edition of 1620 becomes a mere reprint of that of 1612. Occasional slips are to be found in the issue of 1620 which the original printer had avoided; for instance, "horses" for houses in the famous encomium on the Golden Age that Don Quixote addressed to the goatherds—a mistake repeated in the folio of 1652.

Mr. Fitzmaurice-Kelly's introductions are exceedingly interesting. He possesses wide knowledge of his subject, a strong interest in it, plenty of vivacity, and a shrewd judgment. In all important points he has made a great advance since he wrote his 'Life of Cervantes.' Unluckily, however, he has at the same time acquired an off-hand way of pronouncing his opinion that is apt to provoke dissent. For instance, when he refers to "the Madrid text of 1608, an edition thought by some (for reasons hitherto unrevealed) to have been corrected by Cervantes himself," readers who have paid attention to the matter will feel inclined, in sheer resentment at such a misrepresentation, at once to side with Mr. Watts in that dubious and difficult question. But these are, after all, little more than faults of manner. In most instances Mr. Fitzmaurice-Kelly shows himself a judicious and thoughtful critic; as, for example, when he points out, as M. Morel Fatio did in the excellent lecture he delivered at Oxford, that it is a serious mistake to attribute to Cervantes ideas and opinions at variance with those of his country and generation. This delusion has been particularly common among English writers. It led so able a man as Landor to see in 'Don Quixote' "the most dexterous attack ever made against the worship of the Virgin"; and Rawdon Brown to find in it an elaborate satire on the policy of the Duke of Lerma.

"To attribute to him qualities to which he never pretended—qualities which he not only had not, but which he could not have had and been the author of 'Don Quixote'—is to do him heinous wrong. Cervantes never rises above the average thought of his time: as, indeed, why should he? He shares the petty hopes and fears, the trivial joys and pains of common humanity; and the sympathy which makes him kin to all the world forms a great part of his universal force. The average Spaniard of the seventeenth century with the temperament of genius: such precisely Cervantes was, and such he approves himself in every line of his masterpiece."

Mr. Fitzmaurice-Kelly is equally happy in what he says about Cervantes's opinion on the expulsion of the Moors, which has been a stumbling-block to many of his admirers in this country, who try to believe that Cervantes took the nineteenth century's view of the matter, and seem to forget that he had been a captive at Algiers:—

"It is in perfect keeping with his character and his view of life that he should hate the Moors, and should applaud their expulsion. That is Cervantes the citizen, as we know him, and should wish him to be. His appreciation of their picturesque value is always present to Cervantes the writer, the observer of whim, custom, and social ritual."

We are glad to see, too, that Mr. Fitzmaurice-Kelly gives no credence to the theory that would identify Avellaneda with Lope de Vega. His arguments are cogent, and he is also effective in marshalling the proofs he adduces of Cervantes's attacks upon Lope, for although it is not quite clear that in all the passages cited Cervantes is alluding to Lope, there are enough cases in which there is no doubt of his meaning. On the other hand, Mr. Fitzmaurice-Kelly appears to minimize too much the gravity of Avellaneda's offence. If we look at it from Cervantes's point of view (and that is the fair point of view to adopt), it must be pronounced a shameful outrage which deserved all the strong expressions Cervantes employed against the criminal.

There is only one important point on which these introductions are open to complaint, and that is the writer's silence regarding the sources of his statements. For example, it was Duffield who showed that Shelton translated from the Brussels edition, and as Duffield's translation is at present unduly despised, it is only fair that this service of his should be credited to him. Again, it was first proved in a correspondence in July and August, 1879, in these columns that the editio princeps of Shelton's version of the first part was dated 1612; and Mr. Fitzmaurice-Kelly's suggestion that the entry at Stationers' Hall of a translation of the second part referred to a version of Avellaneda's work was made in the same correspondence. Furthermore, Mr. Fitzmaurice-Kelly refers to an entry on Mr. Rawdon Brown's copy of 'Don Quixote' in the British Museum for his identifications of the characters in 'Don Quixote'; but surely he must be aware that Mr. Brown's exposition of his theory appeared in this journal in a series of communications published in 1873 and 1874.

It is a little disappointing that Mr. Fitzmaurice-Kelly can throw no light on the question, Who was Shelton? and yet it was not to be expected that he could. Shelton had most likely acquired his knowledge of Spanish colloquially, and he guesses at the meaning of the words he does not know instead of turning up his dictionary. Probably he was one of the many English who went to trade in Spain after the peace of 1604. Nor can we share Mr. Fitzmaurice-Kelly's willingness to approve of the attempt to connect Shakspeare with Cervantes by attributing to the former the play of 'The History of Cardenio.' It is natural enough for Englishmen to desire to find some link between the two greatest writers of their age; but the idea that Shakspeare had any hand in the drama of which we know only the name has little solid basis to rest on, and Mr. Fitzmaurice-Kelly does not better matters by talking of "Shakespeare, who read everything." There is no certainty about the matter, but we are inclined to think that Shakspeare was probably no great reader.

This is all the fault we have to find, and we may conclude with once more thanking Mr. Fitzmaurice-Kelly for reprinting Shelton, and for the zeal, ability, and knowledge he has shown in his prefaces. Messrs. Constable have, as usual, done themselves credit by the excellence of their typography, the blackness of their ink, the clearness and boldness of their fount of type, and an appropriate breadth of margin. The volumes, too, like the former issues of "The Tudor Translations," are as pleasant to hold as they are pleasant to read.

A History of Rome to the Death of Cæsar. By W. W. How and H. D. Leigh. (Longmans & Co.)

THIS solid volume of 570 closely printed pages is, on the whole, the best school history of Rome at present forthcoming. In spite of the obvious faults to which we shall have to call attention, it can be recommended to the intelligent schoolmaster in preference to any of the larger manuals.

Following Mommsen's example, the authors do not carry their chronicle down to Actium, the obvious landmark for a history of the Republic. Other writers before them have stayed their pens at Cæsar's death, and apparently the present generation of scholars hesitate to continue their story when Mommsen fails them as a guide; yet there is little excuse for omitting the tale of the senatorial reaction of 44–43, and for leaving the fate of Cicero and Brutus untold. A history of the Republic should at least reach down to Philippi, even if it stops before Actium.

There is much to commend in the book. The two authors have contrived to dovetail their work so neatly together that it is impossible to make out where one ends and the other takes up the story. Their views are broad, consistent, and sensible. Though they have written at considerable length on constitutional points, they are not dominated by the prevailing delusion that the interest of Roman history is purely constitutional. This is a great merit in days when so sound and able a scholar as Prof. Pelham can in an "Educational" history dismiss Cannæ in one line and the Cimbri and Teutones in two. The experiments of Rome as a military power and her administrative dealings with her empire are far more important than the endless tinkering of her statesmen with the machine, cumbrous from the first and unworkable at the last, which historians have agreed to call the Roman Constitution. We welcome, therefore, the bright and vigorous narratives of the great campaigns of the later republic, from the second Punic war to Thapsus and Munda. In the earlier wars, down to the days of Pyrrhus, the authors have to be perpetually warning us that only the general outlines of Livy's story can be trusted. They do their best to disentangle fact and fiction, bearing always in mind that "in these times the Roman annals tell us of many splendid triumphs, but as we hear of no permanent fruits of victory, we may safely ascribe their glory to the imagination of patriotic orators and chroniclers. Each of the great houses had its own fabled exploits extolled in the orations delivered at the funerals of its chief members, and afterwards incorporated in the family chronicles, from which Fabius Pictor and the later annalists drew those stirring adventures and graphic portraits of individuals which are preserved for us by Livy and Plutarch."

The constant exercise of criticism when the Volscian and Samnite wars are being discussed makes the narrative somewhat hazy and uncertain; but this is unavoidable, and we do not blame the authors for one moment when they keep holding up to us perpetual danger signals as to the credibility of incidents which they find it their duty to relate; these early legends must be given because of their very real influence on later Roman history. In a similar way the modern historian is obliged to mention the False Decretals or the Laws of Edward the Confessor, not because he believes in them, but because of their great importance in the development of subsequent ideas. Many of the modes of Roman political thought in the first century B.C. would be unintelligible without the legends of Brutus and Ahala, the Decemvirs or the Gauls at the Allia. There is a good deal to be said for the device of relating these stories in archaic diction, a method employed by Messrs. How and Leigh, as by other writers before them, to mark the fact that they are not speaking in their own person when they retail these ancient fictions.

We find much to praise in the well-turned character sketches of Roman statesmen and generals which abound throughout the book. The two Scipios are made decidedly more comprehensible than usual; Sulla is not a mere paradox; Caius Gracchus is not the demigod of Plutarch nor the would-be tyrant of Mommsen. As a fair specimen of the style of our authors we give their verdict on that very capable but reckless politician:—

"Caius Gracchus had no idea of a constitutional revolution: we have no real evidence that he meant to introduce a tyranny based on plebiscites. He abolished nothing and introduced nothing. An energetic administrator with an insatiable appetite for work, he found fresh spheres of activity constantly opening out before him, and, like the emperors later, concentrated many offices in one person. Administrative reform, Italian franchise, foreign emigration, possibly the Romanization of the provinces, were Gracchan ideas. But his work was largely frustrated by his own vehemence and his passion for revenge. If his end was patriotic his means were dangerous, and indeed concealed a latent revolution. His Corn Law debauched the masses and ruined the farmer. He plundered Asia to buy a party. In raising up the Equites against the Senate he drove out Satan by Beelzebub. An idealist in a hurry, he failed to see facts as they were, and succeeded in weakening the only possible government. The time was not ripe for monarchy: to a republican the idea of it was impossible. The net result of his work was to demonstrate the impossibility of any genuine democracy in Rome."

Occasionally, as is but natural, we find ourselves disagreeing in small matters of fact or opinion with Messrs. How and Leigh. It is difficult to think that the implication of Crassus in the Catilinarian conspiracy can be dismissed with the epigram that "the Rothschild of Rome is not likely, for all his crooked policy, to have proposed to cancel his own debts and burn his own houses." Surely it is quite conceivable that Cicero spun a mighty tale of cædes and incendium out of a small basis of fact, and that the "plot" was an ordinary democratic intrigue, not an anarchist rising. If so, Crassus, who loved to fish in troubled water, may well have been pursuing his sport in this particularly turbid pool. The old belief in Carthaginian trade to Cornwall for tin (p. 143) is now, we believe, generally discredited. The Cassiterides are not to be looked for further north than Spain. Hasdrubal's line of march from the Upper Guadalquivir to the Rhone can hardly be called with accuracy "Wellington's route along the north coast and through the Western Passes into Gaul" (p. 217). Wellington, as a matter of fact, did not proceed along the north coast, but marched up the Douro; and he did not force the Western Passes (Maya and Roncesvalles), but forded the Bidassoa at its mouth by Fuentarabia. A casual reading of the second paragraph on p. 482 would certainly lead the student to imagine that Pompey annexed the kingdom of Pontus, and formed it into a province—not that he took over its capital Sinope, but left nine-tenths of the territory of the state to native princes. Croton had not "ceased to be a Greek city" when the Romans conquered South Italy (p. 18). Its civic existence, though often troublous and unhappy, did not end till it was taken by the Bruttians in the second Punic war.

All these are very minor points; yet we have two considerable grievances against Messrs. How and Leigh. The first is that their racy and vigorous diction not unfrequently degenerates into over-colloquial phrases, and sometimes into mere slang. We do not like to read that an Asiatic army "bolted outright," or even that a Greek army "scuttled." The statement that "to Sulla life was a supreme ironic game in which 'Fors Fortuna' held trumps" (p. 415) combines two styles of writing in the most unhappy manner. Reading in the middle of a paragraph on p. 283, otherwise blameless and stately enough, that "Diæus was a fish out of water who raised a storm of patriotism to cover a dirty job," the reader is almost reminded of the oratorical flights of Punch's correspondent Mr. Jabberjee. The statement, on p. 311, that in managing the rotation of provinces "the sacred lot itself could be cooked with a little ingenuity," falls under the same condemnation.

But worse, from the schoolmaster's point of view, than a tendency to colloquialism are the not unfrequent lapses of Messrs. How and Leigh into the "sin of allusion." We mean that they make references to facts which they do not relate, in such a way that the schoolboy can only be puzzled or harassed by them. Take, for example, the instance on p. 227 that "Massinissa, by the reduction of Cirta, gained only to lose the loved and lovely Sophonisba." Such a sentence is a mere riddle to any one who does not know the story of the unfortunate queen and her death. Again, we must protest against the following sentence on p. 212:—

"For some years after 212 the flying squadrons of Muttines, a brilliant officer of Hannibal's school, carried on a successful guerilla warfare in Sicily, till the folly and jealousy of Hanno led to his own emphatic defeat by Marcellus at the Himera, and the delivery of Agrigentum by the superseded and indignant half-breed to Lævinus."

When the authors have omitted to tell the reader that Muttines was the son of a Carthaginian and a Libyan, it is wholly inadmissible for them to begin talking of "the half-breed." How is the schoolboy to know that Muttines is the person alluded to rather than any other of the characters who appear in the surrounding paragraph? The phrase is a mere riddle when the materials to construct the answer are not given.

We recommend a careful revision of the book, to get rid of these two classes of faults, and then it will be quite worthy to hold the position of the authorized history of Rome for educational purposes for the next ten or twelve years.

NEW NOVELS.

Le Selve. By Ouida. (Fisher Unwin.)

THE theme which Ouida has devised for her last story offers possibilities enough to have furnished more than this slight volume. A young Russian of good birth, a follower of Tolstoi, and a fugitive from his own country on account of his political notions, is placed by an Italian friend in the post of steward or manager of a large estate situated among forests somewhere (for Ouida's indications of locality are, as usual, precise, but inconsistent with each other) to the north of Rome. The peasants are such as Ouida loves to depict the people among whom she lives—bestial barbarians, possessing no human quality but malice, steeped in superstition and immorality:—

"They did not want to learn thrift, or cleanliness, or common sense. They only wanted to be filthy, and lazy, and corrupt, and thievish, in the immemorial way transmitted from their forefathers."

We had an idea that Ouida looked back to the past—some three or four centuries ago—as the time when everybody was, at least outwardly, dignified and beautiful; but it does not much matter. However that may be, the peasants and the young Slav, with his enthusiasm for humanity and belief in the possibility of making silk purses out of sows' ears, do not exactly hit it off; and they try to burn him in his house. For the events leading up to this benevolent attempt, and for the result of it, readers must be referred to the book. In spite of a good many of the absurdities of thought and expression which long experience has taught us to expect from Ouida, we have read worse stories in the past year. As has been hinted, we only regret that she did not work out her picture on a larger canvas. She might then, too, have explained a mysterious allusion to a time, a hundred years before the date of the story, when "Murat's cavalry encamped beneath the trees" of her forest. As the only date in the last century when French cavalry came that way is not yet a hundred years ago, the story must be of the nature of prophecy.

A Golden Autumn. By Mrs. Alexander. (White & Co.)

THE weakest link in the long chain of narrative by which Mrs. Alexander connects the matrimonial fortunes of Derek and Celia Rivers with their relations to many of their kin and acquaintance on both sides is the weakness and impatience, to give it no harsher name, of Capt. Derek Rivers himself. In many respects the gallant officer is no bad type of the conventional man of society, self-engrossed, limited, fairly good-tempered, and observant of the ordinary shibboleths and canons of the time; but after marrying a pretty young Philistine of the trading class for the sake of her "tocher," to leave her on the second occasion on which his taste is outraged by her unwise allusion to the fortune she has brought him is absurd even in one so fastidious and susceptible in the matter of his dignity. The many trifling ways in which Celia comes short of his fashionable ideas of "form" are not sufficient, in combination, to outweigh in the mind of a man of moderate common sense her sterling simplicity and her ardent, if rather exigent affection. Yet in the characters of Celia and Lady Mary, the cousin who wisely declines to be Derek's coadjutor in improving his wife's middle-class defects, the author shows a good deal of intuition and subtlety. The frankly vulgar Aunt Sarah, "the sort of hag that no fellow could possibly stand," is also in her way a well-drawn figure. Celia's loyalty to her old relation is quite clear-sighted, and as much to her credit as the affection which she retains for her unsatisfactory husband.

Kitty the Rag. By Rita. (Hutchinson & Co.)

"Human natur's a grand thing, and 'tis the same wid us all whin it's dinner time," says one of Rita's most lively Irish characters. But in spite of this common ground, the infinite variety and disparity of its exponents are rather to be deduced from the writer's studies in that complex subject; for characterization reaches a higher point here than in any of her previous works. Kitty herself is a compound of the selfishness and thoughtless cruelty of a child with an instinctive ambition which is unlikely from its extreme precocity. At eight years old, allowing for heredity if we like, it is early for so marked and reasoned a determination to declare itself; yet there is a wild energy about the irregular scion of the Marsdens of Knockrea which in the end compels every one to do her bidding. Hermia, Lady Ellingsworth, is in every respect a contrast to the child she has borne to her peasant lover in days when, motherless and neglected, she found her resources in truant sports by hill and river. She is cold, proud, and melancholy, the wife of a commonplace nobleman she has been forced to marry and does not love, disillusioned with society, and sceptical as to the future. When she returns to Ireland after long absence, every sight and incident reminds her of the tragedy of her youth. The front that she shows to disasters that tax her heart to the utmost forms the real pith and marrow of the tale; and she is about the highest achievement her author has accomplished. Hardly less interesting is Eugene the priest, who nearly, in spite of the barrier of crime that reinforces that of religion, falls in with the notion of reunion that Hermia for a time considers possible.

Two Cousins and a Castle. By Mrs. Lovett Cameron. (White & Co.)

The tragedy of poor Tom Spinks's suicide is in contrast too abrupt with the general farcical comedy of the castle at Portalloc. The reader is getting interested in the prospects of Tom's gentle cousin Mab, having ascertained that it is the young French attaché she will marry, and being amused at the rather obvious strategy by which the beautiful minx Dorothy Duke is making play with Tom's father, the Birmingham millionaire, when the suicide of the son comes as a most unlikely shock. Certainly poor Tom had not much brains, and was therefore the more likely to experiment upon them with a pistol; but some third course might have been found for him, especially as it is clear his survival could not have seriously embarrassed his cousin. His dogged devotion to an unworthy woman is not his least natural trait. Indeed, all the actors are fairly lifelike, the only outrageously exaggerated part being that of the too fascinating Dorothy. The old squire at Portalloc is picturesque, like his mansion. Trifling, but well told, must, we think, be the verdict on 'Two Cousins.'

A Doubtful Loss. By Norman R. Byers. (Digby, Long & Co.)

The publishers have saved us the trouble of expressing any opinion upon this work. "The story of the heroine keeps the reader," they tell us,

"on the stretch as it is unfolded, and while every page is instinct with life, the interest ever intensifies to the close. Rarely has a novelist succeeded so well in completely baffling all attempts to anticipate the end of what is a charming tale of contemporary life."

The statement made in the first sentence had not occurred to us. The second is true enough; but that is mainly because most novelists make the ends of their stories follow more or less "inevitably," as the modern term is, from the incidents of them. Mr. Byers introduces a good deal of irrelevant business of mysterious objection on a gentleman's part to the marriage of his daughter, followed by intestacy and sudden death. His heroine overhears a conversation from which she gathers that her lover is at the same time her uncle; she makes a needless mystery of it to him; and by the time she discovers that he is not her uncle he is married to another girl, with whom, so far as the reader knows, his relations have hitherto been of the very slightest. A well wrapped-up plot is one thing, a purely arbitrary dénoûment like this is another.

BOOKS OF TRAVEL.

Any work on Armenia by a recent traveller will necessarily attract attention. Mr. Brayley Hodgetts's qualifications for writing Round about Armenia: the Record of a Journey across the Balkans, through Turkey, the Caucasus, and Persia, in 1895 (Sampson Low & Co.), were that he was special correspondent of the Daily Graphic, that he has been a good deal in Russia and knows the language, and that he has been "as far west as New York," though he was never in the East, as to which last, indeed, he shows some untravelled naïveté, rare in these days, and pleasant, if hardly reassuring in a public instructor. However, he converses with all sorts of people and records their views, which, as a rule, he seems tacitly to accept; and he generalizes rapidly, as where he describes the entire Circassian race from a group he passed in the train to Tiflis. His opinion of the Turks he must have taken out ready made from England, unless he formed it during an untimely detention at Trebizond, for a newspaper writer is not a popular personage at present on either side of the Russo-Turkish frontier. At all events, on landing at Batoum,

"I could see no trace [on the Russian faces] of that fierce and cruel fanaticism and that animal stupidity which cloud the countenances of the officials of the Sultan.....The police officer who came on board to examine our passports was a courteous European gentleman, who wore a look of calm dignity, which was very different from the low cunning insolence of the Turks.....I breathed more freely. The very air seemed to be different.....I was in another world."

Nevertheless, in this other and presumably better world, he soon discovered that the Russians were "egging on the Turks" to massacre the Armenians, while "Russia was, in her way, and by more civilized methods, doing just as much to exterminate the Armenian race as Turkey." The more educated Russian Armenians are accordingly, he says, trying to establish an autonomous Armenia outside of Russia. But it would not at all suit Russia to have such a barrier established between her and the decaying empires of Turkey and Persia—those ripe pears for whose fall she is watching and preparing. Among the many casual acquaintances with whom he discussed the great question were Russian soldiers and civilians, Armenian monks and merchants, and an interesting group of refugees, whose account of their own fighting powers, even allowing for exaggeration, impressed him much. Their contempt for the Kurds as opponents in war, unless when backed up by Turkish regulars, is, if real, and not assumed, contrary to the usual impression on the subject. In the Caucasus, if we are to believe our author, brigandage is rampant, and law and order generally disregarded; but it is not always easy to know how far he accepts or endorses the opinions he quotes. Upon the extreme views he propounds of the duty of England to coerce the Turk single-handed we need not enter. At Baku, on the Caspian, he visited the oil wells, and tells some good stories of official corruption. Few travellers would now think of describing a camel, and we are apt to forget what a quaintly picturesque object it is:—

"The camels are generally preceded by the queen camel, who wears a curious kind of bonnet or cap, quaintly decked out with ribbons, tassels, and bells. The dignity with which she carries these gaudy trappings, the daintiness with which she steps out on her gawky legs, and the ugly grace of her long neck, her protruding under-lip and her teeth, which remind one of the French caricatures of the English Mees of a bygone generation, makes one understand all the satire of the French name of chameau for an old maid."

"'Do you know what these are made of?' Mr. Wood asked me, as he handed me an ash-tray of papier-mâché. 'They look like papier-mâché,' I replied. 'So they are,' he said; 'but they are made of British Bibles. You have no idea what a boon these Bibles are to the village industries of Persia.'"

The incidents of the journey are well described, but the main purpose of the book is to discuss the prospects and circumstances and character of the Armenian race, and to show that they are intellectually and morally superior not only to the Turks, but to the Russians. Mr. Hodgetts has a word also about the Persian Armenians, who, he says, are better off as to government than the other two sections, for Armenia (as he rashly hazards the old quotation) "omnia divisa in tres partes." Such expressions as "incrustated with superstition" and "speedied my departure" are hardly English.

Travels in Unknown Austria. By Princess Mary of Thurn and Taxis. With Illustrations by the Author. (Macmillan & Co.)—The days have rather gone by for books of travel of the old gossiping kind, for the histories of troubles with porters and the exactions of the landlord. Princess Mary of Thurn and Taxis so far appreciates these facts that she overlays her descriptions of scenery in the South Austrian provinces ("This is Illyria, lady," for the greater part of the volume) with rather dreary humour of the Jerome K. Jerome order. In the Castle of Duino "it is a nice sad sort of feeling that comes over you: you think of your debts, of the friends of your youth that are dead and gone, of your elderly relation from whom you have expectations and who will not die, and other melancholy things of a like nature; but all your troubles seem far away, and are quite pleasant, 'grateful, and comforting.'" The man at the beginning who says, "I always stick to my principles: the summer in Cairo, the winter in bed," is a trifle better. On the title-page the illustrations are said to be "by the author." But here and there we have a hint of two authors, who criticize each other, after the example of two of those in 'Norway' or 'Three Men in a Boat.' The lady duly quotes Virgil à propos of the Timavo, Antenor potuit.....

Fontem superare Timavi, and so forth. And then a little later on she tells us that near the mouth thereof the Romans built the temple to "Speranza Augusta"! In truth, the writing of the book is not much, and the illustrations are on a level with the letterpress. They would serve to remind one of familiar views, but have no artistic value.

In the preface to Italian Highways (Bentley & Son) Mrs. R. M. King admits that she feels "a strong sense of presumption in adding myself to the number" of writers who have been to the same places before her, but considers that she is justified by the fact that "any traveller who records his own personal impressions will put things more or less in a new light," and adds, "I regard facts something in the light of beef and mutton, as so much raw material for the cook to exert his skill on." No doubt; and if the "cook" be a Heine or a Stevenson the result will probably be a sufficiently pleasing combination of old and new. But some things that are new are not of necessity worth recording, and in this category we fear that Mrs. King's impressions of travel must be placed, even if they are new, which we can hardly think that they are, if "new" means that no one else has had a similar impression before her. As for her facts, they are most of them to be found in the accredited guide-books. Into these, indeed, she does manage to introduce a little novelty. It is not generally known that Frankfort shared with Aachen, Milan, and Rome the honour of being the coronation-place of the emperors. Some of the later Cæsars may have gone through the rite there, but they never claimed on the strength of it to be more than "erwählte Römische Kaiser." In science also Mrs. King has some new observations, as that when the sunlight falls on the pavement of San Petronio it "moves in minute, but visible pulse-like jerks." Does the earth then revolve on cog-wheels? Also, if the people of Bologna set their watches, as they would appear to do, by the meridian passage of the sun, the time in that city must be rather erratic. Or were the people who "stood watch in hand" merely ascertaining the error of their respective timepieces by the aid of the Nautical Almanac? And what are the "certain geological strata" which "positively bristle with extinct craters"? We had vaguely supposed that every geological age had had its volcanoes. But indeed, as Mrs. King says, "the depths of travelled ignorance are .....profound." Was it in order to leave something for future explorers to discover that, in the course of some dozen pages or so devoted to Padua, she omitted all mention of the Arena Chapel? There is, however, one good story in the book—that of the field-cricket, Grillo, who was bought in a little cage at Florence on Ascension Day, was called a "netter Kerl" by the cloak-room attendant at Cologne, and survived till September in England. But though "one grasshopper can make a spring," one cricket can hardly make a book.

In South Africa. By H. Lincoln Tangye. (Horace Cox.)—Mr. Tangye writes fluently and shrewdly of what he has seen and experienced, but the kind of travelling described and the ground gone over by him have already furnished material for a large issue of personal narratives, and it will henceforth need an observer of more than common insight, and a pen gifted with exceptional power of presentation, to invest "travels in Rhodesia," unmarked by extraordinary incidents or vicissitudes, with any special attraction or value. If this be true of Matabeleland, there is, surely, still less necessity for the production of another volume giving literary form to impressions formed by a passing stranger and sojourner regarding the Dutch colonies in Africa and about Natal, with which the first part of this book is mainly occupied. Doubtless there are wayfarers who bring so distinct and fascinating a personality to bear upon all they meet with at home or abroad that they have always something to tell about the most bewritten roads or people, which only they could have seen or told. They handle a worn theme so deftly that we never consider how often the thing done after this manner has been done before. A new interest is inspired, and that is enough. But travellers and scribes of this stamp are rare, and if Mr. Tangye had been one of them his South African reminiscences would have been fused and cast into a shape quite different from the respectable specimen of the bookmaker's art now before us. The second portion of the work, dealing with the country now styled "Rhodesia," is naturally the most interesting. It contains accounts of the coach journey from Pretoria to Buluwayo, a tramp from Buluwayo to Gwelo, and an excursion to the ruins of Zimbabwe, which are spirited reading, not without a spice of humour on occasion, and commendably free from the flippancy too often splashed over the pages of the "manifest destiny" school of tourists to which this writer belongs. Yet the only appreciable addition to the previously existing stock of easily accessible information—descriptive and otherwise—relating to the same regions consists in the placing on permanent record of the author's own individual opinions on controversial questions of the day. These are freely and somewhat redundantly expressed, insomuch that the volume will be found overweighted with matter of this kind by readers who are unable to endorse Mr. Tangye's admiration of the "rare instinct" with which "the conqueror has built himself a house where the King's own hut stood, so that all recalcitrant or unbelieving Matabele may know it as a sign that Lobengula is swept away by the new power, and that where the old King reigned now rules the great white chief."

The sketch map is poor, but the process-block illustrations from photographs are helpful, and less unpleasant than such pictures sometimes are.

The Mystic Flowery Land: a Personal Narrative, by Charles J. H. Halcombe, with notes by the author and numerous illustrations (Luzac & Co.), is too shadowy to be of real interest. The author, in a series of disjointed chapters, takes us with him up and down the China coast, across to Formosa, and even to the distant island of Hainan. He tells us that he held an office in the China Customs service, but does not admit us into his private history sufficiently to make a connected story of his various flittings. He speaks with great respect of Sir Robert Hart, whom, curiously enough, he describes as "Lord Hart." As Sir Robert has not yet been admitted to the peerage, it is difficult to understand why the author makes so strange a mistake in the rank of his chief. The various ports which he visited furnish topics on which he enlarges with more or less accuracy and knowledge, and supply pieds de terre for a number of exciting incidents. When at Shanghai he made the acquaintance of Miss Wang Sêou Jâe, a Chinese lady, who "was not only young, but a beauty of the most rare type," for whom he developed a decided attachment. The lady was not only lovely, but was possessed of a fortune of fifteen thousand dollars, which was held by a wicked aunt in trust for her. As this lady was avaricious enough to desire to possess herself of her niece's fortune, she threw decidedly cold water on Mr. Halcombe's courtship, and finally carried off her niece, presumably to convert her charms into money. Being anxious, if possible, to recover the young lady, Mr. Halcombe applied to the French inspector on the spot for help. This was refused, and he was advised to engage a certain clever Chinese detective to assist in his search. Then followed an inquiry and a pursuit which reads like a chapter from Sherlock Holmes. On the assumption that he had discovered the house to which the lady had been carried, the detective, at the dead of night, led Mr. Halcombe over roofs, down skylights, through sliding panels, to the innermost recesses of an opium den, where "lay a beautiful young Soochow lady, reclining on a rough couch in a state of insensibility." But it was not Wang Sêou Jâe, who, as a hasty note subsequently revealed, had been carried off by her abductors to Soochow. Another exciting incident was the ingenious discovery by the author of a smugglers' den on the coast of Shantung, for which exploit he leads us to believe he received promotion. The book is well and largely illustrated, and the portraits of the author and his Chinese wife—not Wang Sêou Jâe—which form the frontispiece, are eminently lifelike.

Cairo Fifty Years Ago. By E. W. Lane. Edited by Stanley Lane-Poole. (Murray.)—For some years past the return of winter has brought with it a crop of books written expressly for those fortunate mortals who are able to flee from the fogs and cold of London to the sunshine and light of Egypt. Each year the crop grows larger, and most of the writers of the various books seem to be possessed with the idea of making every traveller either an expert Egyptologist or Arabist. There are, however, many visitors to that delightful country who care more for the Egypt of this nineteenth century than for the Egypt of the Pharaohs, or of the Ptolemies and Romans, or of the Arabs, and to no class of readers will this excellent little book of Lane's appeal more strongly than to these. Whenever Edward Lane's name is mentioned it recalls to the reading man his now classical work the 'Modern Egyptians,' and the man who would know what the Egyptian of one or two generations ago thought and said always turns to Lane, and rarely turns in vain. He knew Egypt as few Western folk have known it, and in some quarters of Old Cairo the old folk still have a tradition of the "Frangi" who rode about the town on a grey donkey, talked the native dialect better than their forefathers, and knew the old street cries and the "swear words" as no other European did. It would seem that the great Arabist conceived a plan for publishing an account of Cairo in a 'Description of Egypt' which he wrote as far back as 1828, but for some reason the plan was abandoned, and it is certain that he had reduced his account to writing, for in 1847 the late Mr. R. S. Poole made a copy of it from his uncle's manuscript. This copy was given by the maker to Mr. Stanley Lane-Poole a few years ago, and it was a happy thought of his to edit it, with notes, for publication. In the ten chapters which form the book Lane traces the history of the city from the year 641 A.D. to his own time, and he fortifies his narrative with frequent extracts from Mas'ûdî and other trustworthy historians. The situation and size of the older capitals of Egypt are accurately described, and Lane's account of the streets and quarters, of the bazaars and citadel, of the mosques both inside and outside the city, and of Old Cairo, &c., could probably not be bettered. Mr. Stanley Lane-Poole has added references to the Arabic works cited, together with short notes and an index. It would be interesting to hear Lane's comments if he could revisit Cairo now and see the roads netted over with electric tramway wires and hear the deafening crash of the car bells, which the drivers work with their feet! The appearance of this posthumous publication is opportune, and the reader who goes to Egypt to learn something of the country and its capital will thank the editor for his care.

This Goodly Frame the Earth: Stray Impressions of Scenes, Incidents, and Persons in a Journey touching Japan, China, Egypt, Palestine, and Greece. By Francis Tiffany. (Gay & Bird.)—Mr. Tiffany has used his visits to the countries named on the title as pegs on which to hang long disquisitions which have the opinions of Kant, Browning, and others as their texts. He tells us little or nothing of the countries which he visited, but writes in rather a wearisome fashion on the subjects of his thoughts and opinions. For example, when travelling in Japan and fresh from the sight of the well-known colossal figure of Buddha, he introduces four or five pages of cogitations in this way: —

"But your philosopher on his perch is no fool of sense and time and space. He will both eat his cake and have it. By degrees his outer eye begins to close and his inner eye to waken. Then inevitably looms up again before him the Nirvana-lapsed Buddha of the morning, and he begins to ruminate on the nature of the century-long influence the mighty dreamer has exerted on the children of this mobile race about one on every hand. So here for his speculations."

When he does venture to give an opinion of the people by whom he is surrounded he is not always fortunate in his remarks. For example, he considers that the Chinese are entirely purged of the failings of vanity and conceit. A more inapt estimate it is impossible to imagine. His description of Japanese women is much truer:—

"They are such dainty, miniature creatures, and wear such a guise of having just flitted down from the pretty pattern on a paper umbrella, that it is impossible to take them seriously as responsible beings.....a halo of perpetual child grace surrounds them."

The book is not satisfying, and is somewhat tiresome.

A travers la Bosnie et l'Herzégovine, by Dr. G. Capus (Hachette), is an interesting volume of travels admirably illustrated, and accompanied by a capital map. Messrs. Hachette sell this handsome volume for five-and-twenty francs; an English publisher would ask two guineas for such a work. At the outset the writer gives an account of the railways established by the Austrians, which attain already a length of 500 miles, mostly of a narrow gauge, and supplies a conscientious and valuable account of the resources of the annexed provinces, which the Government is trying hard to develope, and of the administration of Baron Kallay. More amusing to the frivolous reader will be such passages as that in chap. iii. upon hawking in Bosnia. Under the Austrian rule it seems to be dying out, but until the occupation the Begs of the Kraïna and the Posavina seem to have kept up the sport with some zest. The Bosniac habit of reckoning distance by the time it takes to smoke a pipe is another national trait recorded by M. Capus, according to whom coffee and tobacco are the dominant factors in Bosniac life. The accounts of native superstitions, of the music and dancing of the peasantry, are also worth reading.

Mr. Bryce has added to the fourth edition of his well-known volume Transcaucasia and Ararat (Macmillan & Co.) a supplementary chapter, "Twenty Years of the Armenian Question," a clear and forcible narrative.

OUR LIBRARY TABLE.

Messrs. Macmillan & Co. publish The Yoke of Empire, by Mr. Reginald Brett, who, as the son of Lord Esher, the former private secretary of the present Duke of Devonshire when a Secretary of State, and the intimate friend of Lord Rosebery, has had much opportunity of watching the inner political life of three of the Queen's Prime Ministers, and who, as the son-in-law of Van de Weyer, has probably had access to much confidential record of the political lives of the Queen and the Prince Consort, so far as concerns their relations with Palmerston and Peel. The book contains a brilliant series of essays on the relations of Melbourne, Peel, the Prince Consort, Palmerston, and Disraeli with the Crown, but five out of the six have appeared in a magazine, and, of those named, only the least good, that on "Lord Beaconsfield," is new. The last chapter, "Mr. Gladstone," which is also new, is still less good. All who have not already read the first four chapters should buy the volume. Mr. Brett is master of a pretty style, as witness this about some "Ministers": "The Queen has suffered much at the hands of prolix political enthusiasts, who have treated her as though she were.....a public meeting"; but we fancy that Disraeli was, in private, the author of the last part of the phrase, and that he even used to suggest to his hearers that Her Majesty had used it to him of a rival thus: "He talked to me as if I were a Public Meeting." It was, perhaps, in reality said to one of Mr. Gladstone's colleagues.

What is a Hibernian? We confess ourselves in doubt, but Miss F. A. Gerard's pleasant gossip, entitled Some Fair Hibernians: a Supplementary Volume to 'Some Celebrated Irish Beauties of the Last Century' (Ward & Downey), sets our mind at rest as to one supposition: it is not essential that a fair Hibernian should be a fair Irishwoman, for Lola Montez, one of these beauties, is Creole on the mother's side and Anglo-Irish on the father's; Dorothea Jordan sprang from a Welsh mother and a Yorkshire father; Melesina Chenevix Trench "can hardly be accounted as belonging to the category of Irish beauties" as her parentage was French. The remaining Hibernians, however, are Irish or Anglo-Irish girls, and if they were not, their nationality would not distress us, for Miss Gerard tells the adventures of her beauties so pleasantly that our one regret is that there are not more of them to read about. And in one or two cases the telling is a delicate task: the adventures of Lola Montez, of Mrs. Jordan, and of Lady Blessington make heavy demands on the tact of their biographer, but Miss Gerard is equal to the task she has set herself, and skims lightly over the doubtful passages without ignoring them. Yet we find more amusement with heroines who promise less. We remember the 'Irish Beauties' as a book full of what may be called a light degree of interest and of entertainment. It is seldom that the sequel to such a volume is successful, but the 'Fair Hibernians' is an exception, and is inferior to its precursor in the title only. Despite the less than doubtful character of some of its heroines, it is a book that can be given to young girls, and it is both amusing and instructive, affording as it does bright and vivid glimpses of the manners of the past.

Messrs. Methuen & Co. publish an able little volume entitled The Fall and Resurrection of Turkey, by Mr. H. Anthony Salmoné, which is a manifesto of Young Turkey, but will be found of interest even by those who do not take sides in the present position of the Eastern Question.

A Year in the Fields: Selections from the Writings of John Burroughs, although bearing the name of Messrs. Smith & Elder on the title-page, is made in America. The book is pleasant reading, for Mr. Burroughs is a true lover of nature; the brief preface by Mr. Clifton Johnson is commendable; but it is difficult to feel much interest in many of Mr. Johnson's photographs, which number twenty.

Dr. Gordon Stables describes The Rose of Allandale (Digby, Long & Co.) quite accurately as "a sensational story of love and crime." There is little to add to his words except the remark that it would be difficult to think of any of the usual violent or romantic incidents of melodrama which are not to be found in these eventful pages. They contain moreover adventures by sea and land in profusion, mutiny, murder, marooning, South Sea islands, sharks, natives, and many other properties. The result is a little bewildering and not very happy. The book is awkwardly put together, and can hardly be called a literary work. A little less lavishness in the matter of improbable episodes, and a little more care in the arrangement of them, might have made it more readable.

Messrs. Ward & Downey publish My Village, by Mr. E. Boyd Smith, a prettily got-up and illustrated volume of sketches of life in a commune of Picardy. They are harmless and meritorious rather than exciting.

Messrs. Chatto & Windus publish a somewhat too literal translation, by Mrs. Carey, of the amusing Narrative of Captain Coignet, Soldier of the Empire, professedly "edited" by Lorédan Larchey, and beautifully illustrated. The translator twice states that Moscow was set fire to by "galley slaves," which is a good example of the over-literalness which we have mentioned. Of course, the more accurate rendering would be "convicts," as it would be hard, indeed, to have discovered a galley in the centre of the Russian Empire. The term came into use at Toulon and Brest in the later Middle Ages, and is retained in the French language after its applicability has become eccentric. The book may be recommended for boys as a story of adventure, in spite of its inaccuracies.

Capt. Horace Hayes, the best of writers upon horses, has issued through Messrs. Thacker & Co. a second edition—considerably altered and enlarged, and magnificently illustrated—of his admirable work upon the Points of the Horse, which is, in fact, a complete work on horses, their races and peculiarities.

We lately reviewed an excellent French book on the Jameson Raid, written by "Mermeix," and published by M. Ollendorff, under the title of 'La Révolution de Johannesburg et les Mines d'Or.' An enlarged edition, which lumps together this work and two lectures, one on the gold mines and one on Matabeleland, now appears through the same publisher, under the title Le Transvaal et La Chartered. It contains a map of South Africa which is not above reproach, but it may, like the original work, be commended for its fairness.

Dod's Parliamentary Companion for 1897, published by Messrs. Whittaker & Co., is as indispensable as ever, although some of the figures of numbers of electors in the list of constituencies are for 1895. It is not easy to obtain them for 1897 in time for publication, but those for 1896 ought certainly to be stated. There is an annual return. The letters "H.R.," meaning in favour of Home Rule for Ireland, are not the best general description for the Liberal party. For example, they fit very badly such a case as that of Mr. McEwan, who was unopposed at the last general election, and whose speeches show him to be in favour of a very different form of Home Rule from that usually known by the name. It is, we think, better for a work of reference to give parties the names they give themselves, and any other course is certain to lead to absurdities of classification in individual instances. There are a few things in the biographies of members of the House of Commons which show that they are not quite sufficiently revised each year to be, all of them, kept thoroughly up to the latest state of information; for instance, in one passage (not about Mr. Asquith) Mr. Asquith is incidentally described as being "the Home Secretary."

Debrett's House of Commons and the Judicial Bench is also a most useful volume, and the issue for 1897 (published by Messrs. Dean & Son) is now before us. How far the heraldic bearings of honourable members would, in all cases, stand the criticism of the "X" who writes for a contemporary we do not know, but we imagine that they would not all of them pass muster. The editor very frankly says that he is not responsible for them, and that all they represent are "arms in use," prepared from book-plates or from seals supplied by members. He can do no more, and if "X" should ever make a serious raid upon the House of Commons he must fall foul of the members themselves and not of the editor of 'Debrett's House of Commons.' "X" did begin upon the list both of the judges and of the House of Commons, but he did not carry his investigations in this case far. The statistics of the number of electors are later than those of Dod, and the year for which they are given is appended, which is a useful hint towards caution.

MR. LAIRD CLOWES earned the gratitude of all naval officers for The Naval Pocket-Book last year. The second issue is now published (1897) by Neville Beeman, Limited, carefully revised up to December last, and even more accurate and complete than the volume of last year. The general public will turn to the classifications and table of comparative strengths, and they will find that Mr. Laird Clowes, who is competent, has a classification of his own, which brings out clearly our startling inferiority to a not improbable combination of three powers. The tables of docks show that we could not fight in the Mediterranean without an Italian alliance, which, in the event of a combination of three powers, we could not obtain.—We have also received the new issue of Lean's Royal Navy List (Witherby & Co.), an excellent compilation.

WE have on our table The Lambs: their Lives, their Friends, and their Correspondence, by W. Carew Hazlitt (Elkin Mathews),—Incidents in India and Memories of the Mutiny, edited by F. W. Pitt (Kegan Paul),—Selections from Lhomond's Urbis Romæ Viri Illustres, edited by G. M. Whicher (New York, Leach, Shewell & Sanborn),—Madame Lambelle, by G. Toudouze, edited by J. Boïelle (Whittaker & Co.),—Popular Fallacies regarding Bimetallism, by Sir Robert P. Edgcumbe (Macmillan),—Specimen Lessons on 'The Bible and Temperance,' by J. J. Baker (C.E.T.S.),—A General Freight and Passenger Post, by J. L. Cowles (Putnam),—The Westralian Goldfields, by B. S. James (Hitchcock),—Industries and Wealth of Nations, by M. G. Mulhall (Longmans),—A Man amongst Men, by F. Holmes (Digby & Long),—The Lifeguardsman, adapted from Schimmel's 'De Kaptan van de Lijfgarde' (Black),—Those Children, by Curtis Yorke (F. V. White),—Pioneer Work in the Great City, by John Hunt (Partridge),—Glimpses of Sunny Lands, by R. W. W. Cryan (Kegan Paul),—The Great White Queen, by W. Le Queux (F. V. THE THACKERAYS IN INDIA.

Kingsland, Shrewsbury, Jan. 23, 1897.

THE publication of Sir William Hunter's delightful book reminds me that about ten years ago, being then resident in Calcutta, I made a vigorous effort to discover the house which had been honoured by the birth of the greatest writer who has shed lustre on the Anglo-Indian body, in view to a commemorative tablet being placed upon the building by public subscription. In this effort I was warmly seconded by the late Mr. Robert Knight, the editor of the Statesman, who in the issue of that paper for September 2nd, 1887, devoted a leader to the subject, and by several other friends. Notwithstanding our exertions we failed to discover the house in question, the records neither of the Secretariat nor of the Municipality affording any clue. I ascertained that the assessment papers of the house tax did not extend further back than 1836, whilst the first Calcutta daily, the Calcutta Journal, was not established by J. Silk Buckingham till four years after Richmond Thackeray's death. My researches, however, enabled me to collect some interesting information in connexion with the novelist and his father, and amongst my notes I find an exact record of the dates on which Richmond Thackeray entered on his various public employments. This paper, with which I was favoured by the Secretary to the Board of Revenue, it may be interesting to quote: October 9th, 1797, date of rank as Writer; March 9th, 1798, execution of covenant; October 27th, 1798, arrived in India; December 17th, 1798, Assistant to the Collector of Midnapore; March 11th, 1802, Assistant to the Collector of Dacca; August 17th, 1802, Assistant to the Secretary and to the Persian and Bengallee Translator of the Board of Revenue; April 9th, 1803, Officiating Collector of Beerbhoom; August 1st, 1804, Sub-Secretary to the Board of Revenue; same date, Acting Collector of Beerbhoom; December 30th, 1805, Officiating Collector of Tipperah; August 1st, 1806, Officiating Collector of Beerbhoom; September 20th, 1806, Officiating Judge and Magistrate of Ramghur; January 1st, 1807, Secretary to the Board of Revenue; February 20th, 1808, Acting Judge and Magistrate of Midnapore; December 24th, 1811, Collector of the twenty-four Pergunnahs; died September 13th, 1815.

Thackeray was christened in St. John's Church, the Old Cathedral, and I give below a copy of the baptismal register, which has not, I think, hitherto appeared in print:—

Date of Baptisms.—1812 January 3d.
Name and Age of the Baptized. N.B. S. Son, D. Daughter.—William Makepeace, born 18th July, 1811. S.
Name and Situation of Parents.—Richmond Thackeray, Esqr., of the Civil Service, and Anne his wife.
By whom and where Baptized.—The Revd. J. Ward, D.D.

Seeing that Richmond Thackeray apparently held the appointment of Judge of Midnapore at the date of his son's birth, and that a period of nearly six months elapsed between that date and the baptism, we are almost led to the conclusion that the boy was born not at Calcutta, but at Midnapore, and that his baptism was deferred until his father received his Alipore appointment. Tradition has, however, so persistently declared that the birth took place in Calcutta, that I do not feel venturesome enough to dispute it. It is quite possible that the records do not give the date on which the father's deputation to Midnapore ended.

Sir William Hunter's book, with its record of strenuous endeavour and of resolute deed, is well calculated to excite a spirit of emulation in the breasts of those who are about to join the noble service which he himself so long adorned. One sentence may perhaps need modifying in a second issue. A son of Lord Sandwich and of the celebrated Miss Ray could hardly have accompanied William Makepeace Thackeray, the elder, to India in February, 1766. Martha Ray was shot by Hackman in Covent Garden Piazza on April 7th, 1779. Her age was stated on her coffin-plate to have been thirty-four, and the date of her birth would, therefore, have been 1745. She may have been a few years older, but could not possibly have been the mother of a son who must have been born about 1750. Her second and best-known son, Basil Montagu, was born on April 24th, 1770. W. F. PRIDEAUX.

PROF. MASPERO'S 'STRUGGLE OF THE NATIONS.'

MR. MCCLURE'S letter is an extraordinary one; but the public will hardly, I think, be of opinion that it improves his case.

1. I respectfully submit that I have nothing to apologize for. I merely stated certain facts, the accuracy of which is not denied, and I said that in a translation such changes, even though made with the author's assent, were not justifiable unless the reader were informed of the fact. I adhere to that opinion. Mr. McClure confuses the issue by introducing various irrelevant considerations. I said nothing about "finality," and with such questions as what Prof. Maspero may have said in his previous work (which I alluded to simply for the purpose of showing that he had never made any secret of his critical views), whether he may have modified his opinions since that work was published, or whether there are particular views of other critics which he does not accept, I am wholly unconcerned. I confine myself entirely to the volume now before me. This volume, in virtue of the title-page and the note on p. ix, professes to be a translation of 'Les Premières Mêlées des Peuples,' a work which was written not "ten or twenty years ago," but last year (the title-page is even dated 1897), and in which, not to dispute about details, the author adopts, quite unambiguously, a very considerable number of important critical conclusions. Where, however, he has done this his text has been systematically altered, so that the "translation" does not in these cases represent the real opinions of the author. Prof. Maspero's assent to these changes does not alter the case in the least. In a work professing to be a translation the reader, it is clear (pace Mr. McClure), if changes were introduced, ought to have been apprised, clearly and truthfully, of their nature and extent. That there was some motive for the omission is obvious, though it does not interest me to speculate as to what it may have been. The introduction of alterations incorporating fresh discoveries, &c., stands upon a totally different footing, and is not in the least degree parallel to the altered presentation of an entire history.

2. Mr. McClure has misread my first letter. The passages which he has reprinted were not cited by me to show that in Prof. Maspero's opinion the narratives of Genesis were composed under the monarchy. To show that, I referred to two other passages (p. 65, note 2, and p. 70), in which the patriarchal narratives were referred to "les Hébreux de l'époque royale," and where, by the substitution of "the Hebrews of later times," Prof. Maspero's view of the date of these narratives was effectually concealed. If, however, Mr. McClure is right in his contention that in the parallels which he reprints the opinions of Wellhausen and other critics are the base of the representations in "both" the original and the translation, then it looks very much as if the "venerable" Society had, against its will, been made the means of disseminating in England conclusions which it would very cordially disown.

3. I must again demur very decidedly to the description of the alterations as "few." On the contrary, they are both numerous and (even though confined to a few words) important. The suppression on p. 706 of the few words stating that the ark contained two tables on which "it was believed later" that the law was engraved conceals from the reader Prof. Maspero's entire view as to the date and character of the Pentateuch. A few expressions ingeniously altered in p. 707, last line; p. 708, lines 1, 7, 8, and note 1; and p. 709, note 1, ll. 1, 2, have the effect of completely changing the author's picture of the early life of Samuel, and of crediting him with a victory which in the French original is plainly said to be nothing but the invention of the Hebrew chroniclers. I could readily multiply illustrations, but I must have some regard for the columns of the Athenæum.

4. On the back of the title-page it is stated that Prof. Maspero's volume is "published under the direction of the General Literature Committee." In face of these words, the endeavour (singular in itself) to exonerate the Society from all responsibility for what has been done is manifestly futile. That Committee acts, of course, in the Society's name; and when it sanctioned the publication of the work, it either knew, or ought to have known, the author's critical position. The Committee, if it was not responsible for the alterations, ought to have been responsible for them: in view of the principles which the Society is known to uphold, it ought to have satisfied itself that the work was one which the Society could consistently publish, and, if it agreed to the principle of alterations being introduced, have formally authorized the translator to make them. As it is, the Society, by some means or other, has been placed in a false position. It has published the translation of a work written, indeed, by a distinguished archæologist, but by one who is also a "higher critic"; and those who have acted on its behalf in the matter have not had the openness to avow the truth, but have endeavoured in various ways to minimize, suppress, or conceal it. The public are now in possession of the facts which I desired to place before them; and I do not propose to say more on the subject. VERAX.

'THE ROMANCE OF A KING'S LIFE.'

WHILE thanking the reviewer of my little book 'The Romance of a King's Life' for several kind words spoken about it, I beg permission to offer some short remarks on a few others which are not quite so kind.

1. It is impossible to read him without believing that I spoke of a country I had never visited, and that I described it "as seen by telescope from Paris." My descriptions may be good or may be bad, but they come from one who has seen what he speaks of, has crossed Scotland from east to west and from north to south, most of it on foot, following sometimes roads and sometimes sheep tracks, and taking his rest when need was in houses such as those he describes.

2. A sentence in my book concerning the Roman walls can be twisted by an unfriendly reader into the ridiculous meaning which is jocosely attributed to it. The friendly reader will understand the meaning rightly enough. I may add that the dubious meaning is to be found only in the translation; the original has not "in the north of England," but "au nord de l'Angleterre."

3. I am sorry something else was expected than what I could give. The announcement that I would discuss again the authenticity of 'The Kingis Quair' did not originate with me; the plan of my booklet would never have allowed me to introduce in it such a lengthy discussion. My aim was to give a picture of the principal events, romantic and at the same time historically true, in James's life. I used for this motive several documents which had been neglected or ignored, and I excluded many things, e.g., the anecdote concerning the intended capture of Margaret, because I doubt its authenticity. Bower gives it, but Regnault Girard is mute on the subject. I preferred to follow the latter, who superintended all the journey, and who obviously knew best. "Et eust madite dame," says Girard, "très beau temps et beau passage la Dieu mercy et arrivasmes à l'aurrizon de la Pallice près de la ville de la Rochelle le xvii^{e} jour du moys d'avril."

4. I have spoken of Major as "the most critical and best informed of the old historians of Scotland." Upon this the reviewer observes: "Certainly his being a first-rate witness against Mr. Brown is enough to merit the tribute of M. Jusserand's admiration. But with the dispassionate critic that will scarcely be enough." I praised Major because I thought he deserved praise. If my opinion in that respect were a strange opinion, personal to myself, I might be supposed to have been influenced by preconceived ideas; but that opinion is a current one. Will it be pretended that Sheriff Mackay is a "passionate critic" because he praises Major's "wonderfully sound historical instinct" (1892), or that Dr. Sprott, being gifted with prophetic foresight, had Mr. Brown in his thoughts when he wrote that Major's "was the first history of Scotland written in a critical spirit" (1886)? To such opinions the reviewer opposes the verdict (of all men!) of that dispassionate critic —George Buchanan. J. J. JUSSERAND.

 We must ask M. Jusserand to believe that nothing in the review was meant to be unkind. We supposed that the episode in the Channel had somehow escaped notice. It does not seem at all clear that Bower's story, with its feliciter delphinissa evasit, is incompatible with Girard's version. Bower is in other aspects of his account so circumstantial and exact that we cannot throw him overboard so easily as M. Jusserand now does. Concerning Major he shifts the issue we raised. We did not question Major's rank as the most critical of old Scots historians. He was practically the only Schoolman on the list, and his themes, discussed in the spirit of the Middle Ages rather than of the Renaissance, included the burial entire of St. Baldred in three places at once, the causes of men having dogs' heads, the circumstances under which Kentishmen got tails, the propriety of cannon, and the divine ordination of the deep sea. On such topics his critical conclusions would have done no discredit to the twelfth century, and must be remembered as well as his wiser solutions of other problems. But our express words demurred only to "ranking John Major as the best informed of the old historians of Scotland." Few searchers after facts will deny that his independent substantial historical information was extremely meagre—not for a moment to be compared with that of Fordun, Wyntoun, Bower, Buchanan, or Lesley. Buchanan's estimate of him was the weightiest contemporary opinion. M. Jusserand's own "dispassionate critic," Sheriff Mackay, has with customary well-considered judgment said of Major's history that "it is not a history to read for new information."

JOHN LAMB'S 'POETICAL PIECES.'

77, Charing Cross Road, W.C.

MOST admirers of Charles Lamb are aware that his father, John Lamb, was a man of some literary cultivation, and that he was the author of a volume of verse, of which, however, all trace seemed to be lost. In W. C. Hazlitt's new book on the Lambs we find:—

"Poetry of a moral or religious cast appears to have been the bent of the father. Southey had under his eyes the volume written by him; but it has not been recovered. From Southey's slight account we collect that it was the prototype of the 'Poetry for Children.' It would be interesting to stumble upon a copy; for it must exist, if it was printed."

Mr. Hazlitt was right; it does exist, and I have been fortunate enough to obtain a copy. Quite recently a portion of the late Mr. Dykes Campbell's library was sold at Sotheby's. Among other purchases which I made at the sale was a thin quarto volume lettered "Poetical Pieces. John Lamb." This made it pretty clear that so good a judge as Mr. Campbell believed the book to be written by Charles Lamb's father, for the binding is comparatively new, and the book was doubtless bound to the late owner's order. As the book, however, is anonymous, it may be thought that this is hardly sufficient evidence on the point of its authorship; but conclusive evidence is forthcoming, as I shall show presently. But first it will be well to give some account of the work itself. It consists of a quarto volume of pp. iv and 76. Its title is as follows:—

on Several Occasions.

Let such teach others, who themselves excel,
And censure freely who have written well. Pope.

London:
Printed for P. Shatwell, opposite Adelphi, Strand.

There is nothing in the book to fix its date; but I should think it must have been printed some time between the years 1760 and 1780.

The book is dedicated "To the Forty-nine Members of the Friendly Society for the Benefit of their Widows, of which I have the honour of making the Number Fifty." He dedicates his book to them, he says, because they were (in some degree) the cause of his commencing author, by their approving and printing the lines he spoke at the annual meetings of the Society at the Devil Tavern. If they approve of what he has written it must be from good-nature and partiality to one who has but small pretensions to appear in print.

Coming to the contents of the volume, I think I may confidently say that they must have a great deal of interest to all the lovers of Elia. They certainly prove that Charles Lamb's gifts of humour and quaintness were, in some degree at least, an inheritance from his father. I do not say that John Lamb's verses are in any way equal to his son's, but certainly we find in them some of the qualities which distinguish the lighter verses of "Elia."

'Poetical Pieces' contains the following poems: 'The Sparrow's Wedding' and 'The Widow Bullfinch,' two fables; a series of addresses spoken by the author before the Friendly Society already mentioned; some miscellaneous songs; a humorous piece called 'The Lady's Footman,' somewhat in the style of Swift; and 'The History of Joseph,' a versification of the Scripture story. The last-mentioned is the least interesting piece in the volume, for the author appears to have had no talent for serious verse. But, with this exception, none of the poems are without interest, however defective in form they may be. A humorous spirit, rather playful than malicious, though not without a touch of satirical tartness, is the chief characteristic of John Lamb's verses. To enlarge further upon the subject would require more space than I can fairly claim in your pages, and I will, therefore, conclude by quoting the little piece which, as I have said, proves the authorship of the volume:—

A Letter from a Child to his Grandmother.

DEAR GRANDMAM,
Pray to God to bless
Your grandson dear with happiness;
Pray that I may be a good Boy,
Be Grandmam's, Dad's, and Mother's Joy;
That as I do advance each year,
I may be taught my God to fear,
My little frame from passion free,
To man's estate, from Infancy;
From vice that leads a youth aside,
And to have wisdom for my guide,
That I may neither lie nor swear,
But in the path of virtue steer,
My actions gen'rous, fair, and just,
Be always true unto my Trust,
And then the Lord will ever bless
Your Grandson dear,
John L—b the Less.

I cannot help thinking that, in view of the fact that the copy now before me may be the only one in existence, it would be well if a limited reprint of it were issued. Such a reprint might be published at an inexpensive rate; and I shall be glad to hear from any persons willing to subscribe to such a reissue.

BERTRAM DOBELL.

P.S.—Since writing the above I have found that Talfourd, in his 'Life of Lamb,' gives a description of the 'Poetical Pieces,' and quotes from it the little poem I have given above.

Literary Gossip.

IT is understood that the Government will consent to reintroduce the London University Bill this session, but only if it may be expected to pass without serious opposition.

IT is believed that the further educational measures contemplated by the Government for introduction this session, to be proceeded with if circumstances permit, will deal with primary and secondary education respectively. There is an expectation that the former, whilst providing grants in aid of the School Board rate in poor districts, will check the irregular process under which many boards have established schools for boys beyond the elementary limits of age.

THE Secondary Bill, it is said, will provide for new local authorities under County Council schemes, and simultaneously for a non-compulsory register. There is no question that the associations of teachers will oppose any measure for the setting up of local control over secondary education unless it is accompanied by all the guarantees recommended by the Commission of 1894, including an appeal to a professional council.

MESSRS. SMITH, ELDER & Co. will publish at an early date a work by Mrs. Oliphant entitled 'The Ways of Life,' comprising two stories which will be remembered in the Cornhill Magazine, 'Mr. Sandford' and 'The Wonderful History of Mr. Robert Dalyell.' We understand that these stories are being revised by Mrs. Oliphant for the press, and that they will appear with a preface which should to many readers possess a singular interest.

MR. C. J. LONGMAN presided over a meeting of publishers and booksellers at Stationers' Hall on the 21st inst., when it was unanimously agreed to hold the Booksellers' Dinner this year.

PROF. AND MRS. MAX MÜLLER have left Oxford to spend the winter months at Naples.

MESSRS. EATON & MAINS, of New York, and Messrs. Curts & Jennings, of Cincinnati, are issuing a work by Mr. Rassam, entitled 'Asshur and the Land of Nimrod,' being a narrative of his discoveries on the ancient sites of Nineveh, Calah, Asshur, Babylon, Sepharvaim, Cuthah, and Birs Nimroud. It also describes his travels in Assyria, Armenia, Asia Minor, Kurdistan, and Babylonia.

THE scene of the new novel by Mr. A. E. Houghton, called 'Gilbert Murray,' which will be published on February 2nd by Messrs. Smith, Elder & Co., is laid chiefly in Dorsetshire, but in a part of that county not yet appropriated by Mr. Hardy or any other writer of fiction.

DURING February Messrs. Hurst & Blackett will issue three one-volume novels. In one of them, 'An Australian Duchess,' by Amyot Sagon, the scene is laid in the colonies, the writer being personally well acquainted with the scenery and character he describes. From Linda Gardiner will come a story, 'The Sound of a Voice,' based on a melodramatic incident. 'The Wooing of a Fairy,' by Gertrude Warden, is said to be largely "idyllic."

THE three years of litigation between St. Andrews University and the University College of Dundee have ended in the ratification by the Privy Council, in nearly all particulars, of the ordinances of the Commissioners in 1890, which now receive the royal assent. It would appear that the precise effect of this conclusion of the Privy Council will be to establish the union of the College with the University, and to provide St. Andrews with a fully equipped faculty of medicine.

A CORRESPONDENT writes:—

"At the suggestion of Sir Thomas Storey, who founded and gave to his adopted town of Lancaster the building now known as the Storey Institute, devoted to arts, science, and literature, and costing 30,000*l.*, a library is about to be established in its precincts that shall be more especially a library of historical works of the county and town of Lancaster. The Lancaster Free Library Committee will have charge of the work of collection."

DR. J. H. MORDTMANN will shortly publish a monograph on an important series of Minæan texts which were discovered by Prof. Euting and Herr E. Glaser at El-Ola, in North Arabia, and other ancient sites. The text of each inscription will be printed in type specially cut for the work, and will be accompanied by philological and other notes; twenty-two facsimiles will also be given. Dr. Mordtmann's work is entitled 'Beiträge zur Minäischen Epigraphik,' and will form the twelfth "Ergänzungsheft" of Bezold's "Semitistische Studien": the publisher is Felber of Weimar.

THE decease is announced of the veteran Sir Isaac Pitman, who probably had a greater influence on journalism than any other man of his time.—We have further to record the decease of Mrs. Hungerford, the author of 'Molly Bawn' and many other novels, none of which attained its vogue. She died at Bandon.

PROF. KOUNIK has collected some interesting materials on the relations of the Grand Duke Yaroslav the Great, of Kiev, with the foreign courts of Europe, and is about to publish them in the form of a history. The most striking passage in these relations was the marriage of Yaroslav's daughter, Anne Yaroslavna, with Henry I. of France. The Princess Anne was thus the only Russian Queen of France.

CONTINENTAL papers announce that the unveiling of the statue which Venosa (the ancient Venusia) in Apulia has erected to the memory of Horace will take place next September, on which occasion a grand popular festival will be held which is to extend over several days.—Friuli is going to commemorate the twelve hundredth anniversary of the decease of Paulus Diaconus in September, 1899. Why this date has been chosen is not explained. The date of the death of the historian of the Langobards is, if we remember rightly, unknown.

THE Parliamentary Papers of the most general interest to our readers this week are the Report of the Army Medical Department for 1895 (1*s.* 2*d.*); Report on Technical Education in Germany (3*d.*); Return of all Royal Commissions, 1887 to 1895 (3*d.*); three more Reports on the Charities of West Riding Parishes; and an Index to the Sessional Printed Papers of 1895 (1*s.* 11*d.*).

SCIENCE

The Principles of the Transformer. By Frederick Bedell, Ph.D. (New York, the Macmillan Company.)

THIS is an electric lighting treatise of an essentially theoretical order. It contains a heavy dose of mathematics and graphics—perhaps more than is suggested by the title. A book of this description we should have expected to hail from any other country rather than America. Consisting of 404 pages, fairly well indexed, the diagrammatic and other drawings in the volume before us are excellent. A large portion of the text appeared in series, under the joint authorship of Dr. C. Crehore and Dr. Bedell, in the Electrical World of New York in 1891–3 (vols. xxi. and xxii.). The treatment of certain of the problems is, however, distinctly new.

We have already had a large amount of literature on the electrical transformer, notwithstanding that it has so far enjoyed an existence of but eleven years. Dr. Bedell appears to have lost sight of this circumstance in his preface, though, no doubt, fully appreciating the previous work of Dr. J. A. Fleming, F.R.S., Mr. Gisbert Kapp, M.Inst.C.E., and Mr. Blakesley amongst others in the same field.

There is no striking originality apparent in the general arrangement of the subject, and the definitions do not seem to be very helpful. This remark particularly applies to the description of magnetic induction—as it does, indeed, to those proffered by several other writers.

Like most apparatus to be turned to practical account for the use of man—whether electrical or otherwise—when it comes to the point, the "ways of the beast" have to be studied eventually in a practical light based on actual experiment of a character within the scope of the engineer only. The transformer is not only no exception to this rule, but may be said to be a striking example of its truth. After this invention had for some time been brought forth to the world, various mathematicians made it a tool for the ventilation of much mathematics by way of showing what it would do, or indeed—working with a brief—to prove that it would be up to this and that duty. But such paper evidence was utterly futile, as we all know now. It is impossible by any algebraic formulæ to arrive accurately at the rate of variation of the core induction with any given variation of magnetizing force, inasmuch as the real hysterisis loop of iron induction expressed in magnetizing current has yet to be furnished. On these grounds then, though principles are essential for guiding the experimenter, they are of no use whatever in developing an invention unless followed up by practice. Thus it comes about that any book on the subject, to be of real use to those engaged in turning the said invention to account, should be more devoted to the results of practical experiments than to mathematical principles. Dr. Bedell appears to be of a different opinion, judging by the title of his book and the quantity of sine curve mathematics. Maybe, however, his work is intended for the professor rather than the young engineer.

Albeit, the author gives a fair chapter on the design and construction of the transformer, following a short section on the theory of the alternator as well as others on that of the transformer and condenser—strictly mathematical. The historical account of the development of the induction coil is, to some extent, not quite satisfactory in its brevity. The work of Callan (the real inventor) is almost unnoticed. Taking it as a whole, however, the above chapter appears to be carefully prepared. It suitably describes the discoveries, inventions, and designs of Ruhmkorff, Page, Faraday, and Henry, besides the more practical outcomes of Bright, Jablochkoff, Gaulard and Gibbs, Ferranti and Swinburne.

Finally, all we can say is that the book is got up in a manner worthy of the publishers. It does not seem to be likely to have any special sphere of usefulness for the bread-earner, though possibly it may occupy the intervals of the class-room. It is distinctly a book which treats of abstract theory rather than of practice, and it is a question whether there are not too many books of that description already. Otherwise, we can certainly recommend Dr. Bedell's work as a theoretical treatise regarding an invention whose field of operations may become more and more extended.

ASTRONOMICAL NOTES.

AN annular eclipse of the sun will occur on the 1st prox., but the line of centrality will be almost confined to the South Pacific Ocean, which it will cross in a north-easterly direction, passing from the extreme north of New Zealand to Colombia and Venezuela. Over the greater part of South America, as well as in Central America, the West Indies, and the most south-eastern part of the United States, there will be a partial eclipse, though very small in the last-named, except in Florida. The planet Mercury will be at greatest western elongation from the sun on the morning of the 16th, and will be visible in the early morning during the second and third weeks of the month, situated in the constellation Sagittarius. Venus will be at greatest eastern elongation from the sun on the evening of the 15th, and is very brilliant as an evening star, moving in an easterly direction through the constellation Pisces. Mars is now due south at 8 o'clock in the evening, and continues to decrease in brightness; he will be in conjunction with the moon (the second day after her first quarter) on the 11th prox. Jupiter will be in opposition to the sun on the 23rd, and is a brilliant object throughout the night, situated in the constellation Leo; he will be in conjunction with the moon about midnight on the 17th. Saturn is visible only in the morning, rising soon after midnight in the western part of Scorpio.

The Thirtieth Report of the Board of Visitors to the Melbourne Observatory has been issued, and relates to the period from the beginning of June, 1895, to the end of June, 1896, during the first month of which the observatory was still under the direction of Mr. Ellery (now Chairman of the Board of Visitors), whilst during the year from the end of June, 1895, it has been in the hands of Mr. Baracchi, formerly Chief Assistant. The latter post has not been filled up, and while every effort has been made to cope with the difficulties arising from that and other reductions of the staff, and to carry on with efficiency the most important work, it has been found necessary to curtail to a great extent (it is hoped not for any very long time) other operations, and in particular to abandon observations with the great telescope and other equatorials. Mr. Baracchi strongly urges the provision of means for preparing for publication a large mass of previous work, and also for the measurement of the photographic plates. The completion of the share undertaken by the Melbourne Observatory in the photographic chart of the heavens is causing him a good deal of anxiety.

The Nautical Almanac and Ephemeris for the year 1900 has just been published. The contents and arrangement are the same generally as those of the preceding year; and, as in recent years, Part I., containing such data as are more particularly required for navigational purposes, is published separately. The eclipses of the year will be a total one of the sun on May 28th, the central line of which, after passing over the Atlantic Ocean, will cross Spain (where the duration of totality will amount to about one and a half minutes) and Algeria; a partial one of the moon (scarcely more than penumbral) on the morning of June 3rd; and an annular eclipse of the sun on November 22nd, the central line of which will be almost confined to the Indian Ocean. The longitudes and latitudes of 139 observatories are given in this volume; and an appendix containing elements and ephemerides of the four oldest small planets, Newcomb's corrections to the places of the moon in Hansen's Tables, and a continuation of Damoiseau's Tables of Jupiter's satellites.

M. Bigourdan contributes to the number of the Comptes Rendus of the French Academy for the 28th ult. a further list of thirty-seven nebulæ which have been discovered with the western equatorial of the Paris Observatory. Most of these objects are exceedingly faint; of the last he remarks: "Objet qui paraît un peu nébuleux. Il faudrait un instrument plus puissant pour décider s'il l'est réellement."

MR. HORATIO HALE.

BOTH ethnologists and comparative philologists, much as they differ on many points, will agree that the two sciences in which they take a special interest have suffered a grievous loss through the death of Horatio Hale. He was an American by birth, having been born in 1817 in Newport, N.H. He graduated at Harvard in 1837, and whilst still an undergraduate he was appointed to the post of philologist in the United States exploring expedition commanded by the notorious Capt. Wilkes. The seventh volume of the report of that expedition, entitled 'Ethnography and Philology,' was entirely the work of the young student. This large quarto, though well known to specialists, has had but a small circulation. It contains extremely valuable information on Australian and other languages almost unknown before he collected them from the mouths of the natives. The whole work shows on every page the accurate spirit of the scholar combined with the comprehensive grasp of the ethnologist.

After paying a visit to Europe he returned to America and was admitted to the bar in Chicago. Soon, however, he left the United States and settled at Clinton, in Canada, where he spent the remainder of his long and active life. He did excellent service in studying the dialects of the Indian tribes in Canada, and soon became the highest authority in this branch of studies. His papers appeared chiefly in the Transactions of learned societies. Many of them are extremely difficult to get, and students of folk-lore have long wished that these papers might be collected and published in a separate volume. In 1883 appeared his 'Iroquois Book of Rites,' based on some curious Mohawk MSS. of the last century, giving an account of the origin, laws, and ceremonial usages of the Iroquois confederacy. What distinguishes this and all other books of Horatio Hale, such as his paper on the Tutelo tribe and language, his report on the Blackfoot tribes, &c., is his mastery of the languages of the Indian tribes, which he considered essential for a real understanding of their customs and traditions. He is one of the few ethnologists in whose hands one feels perfectly safe when they describe and attempt to interpret the religious ideas of savages. All the work which he has done is sound and solid, and though, owing to his extraordinary modesty, his name has never become very popular, scholars have long felt the most sincere respect for him, on account of his learning and independent judgment as well as of his noble character.

SOCIETIES.

Royal.—Jan. 21.—Sir J. Evans, Treas. and V.P., in the chair.—The Right Hon. Sir J. E. Gorst was admitted into the Society.—The following papers were read: 'On Cheirostrobus, a New Type of Fossil Cone from the Calciferous Sandstone,' by Dr. D. H. Scott,—and '(1) Experiments in Examination of the Peripheral Distribution of the Fibres of the Posterior Roots of some Spinal Nerves, Part II.; (2) Cataleptoid Reflexes in the Monkey; (3) On Reciprocal Innervation of Antagonistic Muscles, Third Note.' by Prof. Sherrington.

Society of Antiquaries.—Jan. 14.—Sir A. W. Franks, President, in the chair.—This being an evening appointed for the election of Fellows, no papers were read.—Mr. C. H. Read exhibited a silver dish of North-Indian work.—Mr. H. Willett, through the President, exhibited a curious painting by Cranach, representing, apparently, Mary, the daughter of John the Constant, and her brother John Ernest. —Mr. J. O. Scott exhibited a full-sized drawing of part of the Westminster frontal.—The President referred to the statement concerning Peterborough Cathedral which had been circulated among the Fellows and others, accompanied by the specification which had been kindly prepared for the Society by the Society for the Protection of Ancient Buildings. The Council unfortunately had not been able to submit the specification to an engineer as they had proposed, owing to the blank refusal of the Dean and Chapter to allow any one to examine the front on behalf of the Society.—The following resolution was proposed by Mr. Norman, seconded by the Rev. R. B. Gardiner, and carried with only one dissentient: "That the Society thanks the President and Council for the admirable way in which they have taken action about the west front of Peterborough Cathedral." — The following gentlemen were elected Fellows: Sir S. Montagu, Rev. F. C. Hipkins, Messrs. W. A. Littledale, W. W. Watts, J. M. Mackinlay, D'Arcy Power, and G. L. Beeforth. Jan. 21.—Sir J. Evans in the chair.—Major B. Wilson exhibited a complete set of twelve painted wooden trenchers or roundels of the sixteenth century in their original box.—Mr. P. Stone exhibited and described a silver-gilt case of mathematical instruments, several of unique character, made by Barthelmew Newsam, clockmaker to Queen Elizabeth, who died in 1593. — Mr. A. Evans read a paper on a remarkable hoard of gold votive objects from Ireland, recently acquired by Mr. R. Day, of Cork, which were exhibited to the Society. The objects were found by a ploughman in subsoiling near the sea on the north-west coast of Ireland. The relics, which were all of gold, consisted of a small votive boat, with yards and spars, the place for the mast, benches for eighteen rowers, and miniature oars, grappling iron, and forked punting poles; a bowl intended for suspension from four rings; two chains of exquisitely fine fabric, with remarkable fastenings; two twisted neck rings or torques; and a large hollow gold collar, with bold repoussé work designs of Celtic character, beyond question the most magnificent object of the kind ever discovered. Examining the objects in detail, Mr. Evans maintained that, not to speak of the very satisfactory nature of the evidence as to the actual finding, there was no sufficient reason for doubting that the relics were deposited at the same place and time. There were, it was true, three classes of objects: the fine chains, perhaps imported; the gold collar and torques, made probably by an indigenous goldsmith for actual wear; and the bowl and boat of thinner and paler gold, designed for a purely votive purpose. The curious mechanism of the fastening of the collar was compared with that of some gold torques found near Carcassonne, dating from the end of the second century B.C., and perhaps part of the celebrated aurum Tolosanum carried off by the Romans from the temple treasure. The balance of evidence, however, inclined to the view that the Irish torque belonged to the first century of our era. The fastening of the chains closely resembled very late Ptolemaic or early Egypto-Roman examples from Alexandria. Mr. Evans scouted the idea that the boat necessarily implied a "Viking" origin. In form and details it was purely Celtic, and it seemed to be a rough model—of the votive kind—of a ship with a timber keel and ribs, but with hide-covered sides, the fabric of which had been borrowed by Cæsar himself from the ancient British shipbuilders. The vessel before them, with its yards and sails, was essentially an ocean-going type, such as had early developed itself on the Atlantic shores. In the characteristic Scandinavian craft adapted for fiords and an inland sea, oars were the important feature. The deposit of such a hoard, containing a miniature ship, in the neighbourhood of the sea, and on a rocky part of the coast, pointed to the conclusion that it was a thank-offering vowed to some marine divinity by an ancient Irish sea-king who had escaped from the perils of the waves. It might well have been dedicated to the Celtic Neptune, Nuada Necht, the British Nodens, whose temple, with illustrations of his marine attributes, had been discovered at Lydney, and whose name, in its Welsh form "Lud," still survived, as associated with the port of London, in Ludgate Hill.

Numismatic.—Jan. 21.—Sir J. Evans, President, in the chair.—Mr. R. Day was elected a Member.—The Rev. R. Baron von Hube exhibited two gold and one silver British coins attributed to the Remi and the Iceni, and also a two-third ryal of Mary, Queen of Scots, dated 1567, and counterstruck with a thistle.—Mr. J. E. Pritchard exhibited a Dutch (?) medalet, having on one side a bishop enthroned and the legend, "Hoc opus est Dei," and on the other the inscription, "Annuciatio [sic] Beatæ Virginis, 1640."—Mr. T. Ready exhibited a copper coin of Mallus, in Cilicia, having on the reverse a seated figure of the city, with river-gods at her feet; the legend was ΜΑΛ ΙΕΡ ΤΟΥ ΘΕΟΥ ΑΜΦΙΛΟΧΟΥ, and the date ΕΤ. ΑΠΟ (=281).—Mr. R. A. Hoblyn exhibited a new rupee struck for Bikanir.—Mr. F. Latchmore gave an account of four coins of Burgred recently found near Hitchin, and also described two silver sceattæ and two pennies of Offa and Alfred which had been unearthed some little time ago in the same locality.—Mr. L. A. Lawrence read a paper on a hoard of short-cross pennies of Henry II., Richard I., John, and Henry III. found in France. Though the coins presented no new varieties, except one bearing the moneyer's name, "Robert Vi," yet it was of considerable importance, as it conformed in every respect to the classification of the coins of those reigns which had been proposed in 1865 by Sir John Evans. —Mr. Grueber read a paper on the recent find of coins made at Crediton, in Devonshire. The coins, which had been found in the ceiling of a room above the vestry of Crediton Church, were 1,885 in number, and consisted of shillings and sixpences of Edward VI., Philip and Mary, and Elizabeth, half-crowns, shillings, and sixpences of James I. and Charles I., and similar coins, including some crowns of Charles II. The coins were all much worn, except quite the later pieces, and presented no new varieties from those described in Hawkins's 'Silver Coinage.' Amongst the coins of provincial mints struck during the reign of Charles I., there were some interesting pieces of Bristol, Oxford, Shrewsbury, and Weymouth. The concealment of the hoard must have taken place about 1685, as the latest piece—a shilling of Charles II.—is dated 1683, and its fine condition proved that it had been but little in circulation.

Zoological.—Jan. 19.—Dr. St. G. Mivart, V.P., in the chair.—The Secretary read a report on the additions made to the menagerie during December last. He exhibited a set of seven slightly enlarged photographs, illustrating the manner in which the rough-keeled snake (Dasypeltis scabra) swallows an egg. These had been taken from a living specimen in the Gardens by Mr. R. F. Nesbit. The specimen from which the photographs had been taken, measuring about 28 inches in length, was also exhibited. He further exhibited a specimen of the Cerastes viper (Cerastes cornutus) from the Zoological Gardens at Ghizeh, which had lately died in the Gardens. This was the specimen, with false horns made of hedgehog spines, which had been alluded to in the newspapers of the last few weeks. On examination it was found that one of the spines had been driven through the skull into the mouth of the snake, and this had probably caused its death. He besides exhibited a photograph of a young anteater (Myrmecophaga jubata) two days old, born in the zoological garden of Herr A. Nill, at Stuttgart. Mr. Sclater remarked that this was the first instance, so far as he knew, of this animal having bred in captivity.—A paper was read by Lord Walsingham, 'On a Revision of the West-Indian Microlepidoptera, with Descriptions of New Species,' which gave a complete catalogue of the species of Microlepidoptera known to occur in the West-Indian islands. This new edition of a former paper by Lord Walsingham, published in the Proceedings for 1891, had been rendered necessary by the acquisition of new material since that date, and by the publication of Mr. Meyrick's new system of classification, which in the main had been confirmed by the author from independent study. The species enumerated were 298 as compared with 132 in the former list, and the number of new genera characterized was 18.—Mr. F. E. Beddard read some notes on the anatomy of the manatee (Manatus inunguis) lately living in the Society's Gardens.—Dr. Lindsay Johnson read a paper 'On the Ophthalmoscopic Appearances of the Fundus Oculi in the Primates.' Dr. Johnson had for some considerable time past devoted himself to the careful examination of the eyes of animals, using the means commonly employed by oculists when examining the human eye. He had found that the back of the eye, when viewed with the opthalmoscope, presented different appearances in various animals. He showed that the eye of the negro only differed from that of the European in colour—that the higher apes closely resembled man in having binocular vision, and alone had the so-called macula lutea, or yellow spot, which is the seat of acute vision. In the lemurs and galagos the back of the eye differed entirely from that of the true monkeys, showing no macula. The galagos, which are night animals, had, instead of a red or brown fundus, a brilliant golden-yellow background to the eye. The paper was illustrated by a large number of coloured drawings.—Mr. Lydekker described certain deer of the Cervus sica group, living in the Duke of Bedford's menagerie at Woburn. Three of these he referred to C. hortulorum, Swinhoe, a species which had hitherto been regarded as inseparable from C. manchuricus. This latter appeared to be only a larger race of C. sica; C. dybowskii being also inseparable. C. mandarinus, Milne-Edwards, was a distinct form, as was also the Formosan C. taëvanus.—A communication was read from Mr. Guy A. K. Marshall on the butterflies of the genus Teracolus. The geographical distribution of the genus was described, and seventy-two species were enumerated, two of which were described as new.

Entomological.—Jan. 20.—Annual Meeting.—Prof. R. Meldola, President, in the chair.—An abstract of the Treasurer's accounts, showing a balance in the Society's favour, having been read by one of the auditors, Mr. H. Goss read the report of the Council. It was then announced that the following had been elected officers and Council for 1897: President, Mr. R. Trimen; Treasurer, Mr. R. McLachlan; Secretaries, Mr. W. F. H. Blandford and Mr. F. Merrifield; Librarian, Mr. G. C. Champion; and as other Members of the Council, Canon Fowler, Mr. H. Goss, Sir G. F. Hampson, Herr M. Jacoby, Prof. R. Meldola, Mr. O. Salvin, Mr. J. W. Tutt, and Mr. G. H. Verrall.—The President then delivered an address upon 'The Utility of Specific Characters from the Point of View of the Darwinian Theory.' His remarks had reference to the paper on this subject, read last June before the Linnean Society, by Dr. A. R. Wallace and the subsequent discussion. Prof. Meldola pointed out that the question of "utility," as necessitated by the theory of natural selection, had hitherto been made to depend too exclusively upon external and visibly manifest utility, a restriction which he did not believe to be warranted by facts. He argued in favour of a connexion of the nature of correlation between apparently trivial external characters and latent physiological characters of great importance to the welfare of the species. From this point of view it was contended that the diagnostic characters used for purposes of description did not truly represent the sum total of the characters which must be regarded as specific. The President concluded by referring to the losses by death during the year of several Fellows of the Society and other entomologists, special mention being made of Mr. A. S. Olliff, Mr. E. Armitage, R.A., Mr. P. Inchbald, Miss G. E. Ormerod, M. Auguste Sallé, Mr. A. Dowsett, Herr J. Flohr, Mr. J. Chappell, and Dr. Morawitz.

Chemical.—Jan. 21.—Mr. A. G. Vernon Harcourt, President, in the chair.—The following papers were read: 'Observations on the Properties of some Highly Purified Substances, by Mr W. A. Shenstone, —'Action of Diastase on Starch,' Part III, by Messrs A. R. Ling and J. L. Baker,—'The Solution-Density and Cupric-Reducing Power of Dextrose, Levulose, and Invert Sugar' by Mr. H. I. Brown, Dr. G. H. Morris, and Mr. J. H. Millar,—'Halogen-Substituted Acidic Thiocarbimides and their Derivatives, a Contribution to the Chemistry of the Thiohydantoïns,' by Dr. A. E. Dixon,—'The Amyl (Secbutyl-methyl) Derivatives of Glyceric, Diacetylglyceric, and Dibenzoylglyceric Acids, Active and Inactive,' by Dr. P. Frankland and Mr. T. S. Price, —'On the Wide Dissemination of some of the Rarer Elements and the Mode of their Association in Common Ores and Minerals,' by Messrs. W. N.

Hartley and H. Ramage,—and 'Derivatives of Maclurin,' Part II., by Mr. A. G. Perkin.

INSTITUTION OF CIVIL ENGINEERS.—Jan. 26.—Mr. J. W. Barry, President, in the chair.—The paper read was 'On the Diversion of the Periyar,' by Col. J. Pennycuick.—The paper was supplemented by an account of 'The Periyar Tunnel,' by Mr. P. R. Allen.

SOCIETY OF ARTS.—Jan. 25.—Mr. J. S. Neville in the chair.—Mr. W. Burton delivered the second lecture of his course of Cantor Lectures 'On Material and Design in Pottery.'

Jan. 26.—Mr. L. F. Day in the chair.—A paper 'On the Artistic Treatment of Heraldry' was read before the Applied Art Section by Mr. W. H. St. John Hope. The paper was fully illustrated by drawings, casts, and a fine series of lantern slides.—A discussion followed, in which Messrs. J. Leighton, H. Stannus, and W. Crace, and the Chairman took part.

Jan. 27.—Dr. H. Parry in the chair.—A paper 'On Voice Production' was read by Mr. W. Nicholl, and was practically and musically illustrated.

HISTORICAL.—Jan. 21.—Sir M. E. Grant Duff, President, in the chair.—The following gentlemen were elected Fellows: Messrs. F. Earle, J. J. Downes, J. B. Hatt, and C. J. Munich.—A paper was read by Major M. A. S. Hume 'On some Survivors of the Armada,' being a collection of narratives, from authentic Spanish sources, of the remarkable adventures and terrible sufferings of the Spanish crews shipwrecked on the Irish coasts.—A discussion followed, in which Prof. J. K. Laughton and Mr. M. Oppenheim took part.

PHYSICAL.—Jan. 22.—Prof. Ayrton, V.P., in the chair.—Mr. Croft gave an exhibition of an ingenious form of clip to fit on an upright retort stand.—Mr. E. C. Baly read a paper 'On the Passage of Electricity through Gases.'

FINE ARTS

The Castles of England. By Sir J. B. Mackenzie, Bart. 2 vols. (Heinemann.)

THE author of this work has selected a noble subject for his theme, a subject which, as Dr. Jessopp has observed in the quaint motto prefixed to these volumes, possesses an irresistible fascination. But he, very sensibly, does not allow it to betray him into gusts of rhetoric. He assumes that every intelligent reader is aware of the important part that castles have played in history, and he confines himself to taking them one by one, and giving us briefly "their story and structure."

There was not only room, there was real need, for an exhaustive account of English castles. So scattered is the work of archæologists among journals and transactions that it is a matter of great difficulty to find what has been written on a given castle, while the only really comprehensive book, Clark's 'Mediæval Military Architecture,' is itself a mere collection of papers which appeared separately, and is sadly lacking in unity. What is, above all, wanted by the student of a long-neglected subject is the means of comparing castles with one another, the most hopeful method here of increasing our knowledge. It is, therefore, peculiarly vexing for his purpose to find in a text-book like that of Mr. Clark only a limited number of castles. It is here that the author of the work before us has rendered some service by including, so far as possible, all castles extant or destroyed. To include them, however, is but the first step. It is obviously required that the author should possess a competent knowledge of history, and that he should have made some real study of ground plans and masonry—that, in short, he should have a grip of his subject. We do not know what proofs had been given by Sir James Mackenzie of a special aptitude for writing on castles; nor is it obvious in the volumes before us.

Mr. Clark's work has naturally been taken as the basis of these volumes, in which some of his valuable plans have been incorporated by permission. The author, however, who has added others, has endeavoured to learn all that is known about the structures of which he treats by wide reading among archæological books and journals, of which he supplies a useful bibliography. But even a glance reveals that it is not so complete as might be wished. A specialist article on 'English Castles' which appeared in the Quarterly Review (1894) would have proved useful to the author, while among local works we may mention Mr. Maxwell Lyte's 'Dunster and its Lords,' a work on Walmer, useful for its castle and those of Deal and Sandown, and 'The History and Antiquities of Colchester Castle,' as instances of books which ought to have been consulted. On the other hand, the author might have kept clear of the credulous Stukeley and his fantasies, in which case, perhaps, he would not have begun his account of Bedford Castle with the fatal words "Richard of Cirencester."

It is much to be regretted that there is not any general introduction, such as would greatly have added to the value of a work of this character. The brief preface affords little information, and its statement that, "with the exception of some stonework at Corfe, there remains probably no masonry of any castles dating prior to the Conquest," is scarcely in harmony with what is said of Dover or with the assertion that Richard's Castle "is remarkable as having been possessed and built by a Norman lord, one Richard Fitz-Scrob, of the Court of the Confessor, before the Conquest." The true beginning of Richard's Castle is a question, one may add, of some importance. Mr. Clark is responsible for certain contradictions in the account here given of the Tower of London, but surely not for the author's error in confusing the later "Baynard's Castle" with the earlier fortress of the lords of Dunmow, which stood on another site. It may be gathered from the preface that Sir James Mackenzie has grasped that essential distinction between the keep and the works surrounding it which Mr. Clark and his predecessors ignored, and for lack of which they were sometimes misled. The most striking instance of this is at Rochester, one of the most stately and most familiar of Norman strongholds. It marked an advance in the study of castles when Mr. Hartshorne proved (though, indeed, it ought to have been obvious) that its keep was not the work of Gundulf, but was erected between 1126 and 1139. This has long been recognized by archæologists, although they have perversely sought to account for a keep (turris) built by Gundulf when he is only said to have built a "castrum." The author repeats this strange error, although, as the Rev. Grevile Livett has shown independently in an admirable monograph, what Gundulf really built was the now surrounding wall. Sir James here suggests that "it is possible" that Gundulf (d. 1108) "should [sic] have furnished the plans of the mighty keep." Nay, he even tells us, under Colchester, that Gundulf was probably "the cleric architect of the Towers of London and Rochester"; while under Hedingham he asserts that both these fortresses "were built by the direct order of the Conqueror." This, it will be seen, is not an advance, but a distinct retrogression, on previous work. A good illustration of this is found in the account of Dover Castle. The author here follows Mr. Clark in the double error of assigning the remarkable attack on the castle in 1067 to 1074 (it becomes, indeed, 1174 in his pages) and of making Bishop Odo relieve the fortress, and himself introduces the fresh one of making Walchelin Maminot surrender it in 1137 "to the Empress Maud"! The worst of it is that these errors are in places the result of sheer carelessness. Thus in the case of the mighty house of Clare we read that the Earl of Hertford was "styled Earl of Herndford," that his relative the Earl of Pembroke was "Earl of Ogie," and that their ancestor Richard FitzGilbert was the Conqueror's "half-brother." So, too, with the house of Malet, eminent among the Conquistadores. Eye, we learn, was given to "Robert de [sic] Malet, son of that Robert who accompanied Duke William from Normandy." His real father, of course, was that "William Malet, the famous warrior of Duke William's army," of whom we read under Enmore, which, by the way, we are here told, "before the Conquest belonged to a Norman family named Courcelle." It was, on the contrary, this family, not the Malets, which obtained it at the Conquest. The confusion as to Hereward, under Bourne, is hopeless; while "Roger de Poictou, to whom the Conqueror gifted [sic] 398 English manors," is actually made, in one breath, to fight at the battle of Senlac in 1066, and to lose his lands "in the time of Stephen," some eighty years later. It would not be necessary to criticize this work so severely, had it not already been widely advertised as unapproached by any that had preceded it in "accuracy" and "erudition." Such is modern criticism.

The number of the castles here dealt with has made it impossible to supply details of their "structure," which is made subordinate to their "story." The author follows Mr. Clark and Mr. Parker in holding that "the earliest Norman military structure is probably St. Leonard's Tower at West Malling, in Kent"; but the excellent photograph which goes with his description enables us to see that this important building differed distinctly from a normal "keep," and has much in common with "Gundulf's Tower" at Rochester Cathedral, which has been described by Mr. Hope. Mr. Livett, we believe, has made some important discoveries as to this Malling tower. It is provoking, after all that has been written on the subject, to find another very early stronghold, the vast keep of Colchester, again assigned to Eudes of Rye, to whom, we read, "the Conqueror granted all his own rights in Colchester." Those rights were granted not by the Conqueror, but by Henry I., and the keep had been built, under the Crown, before that grant was made. Under Dover we read that the second floor of its noble keep "had two tiers of windows, as at London, Rochester, and Hedingham." The same assertion will be found in Mr. Clark's description of the castle; but these two tiers, a distinctive feature at Rochester and Hedingham, are not found at the Tower. One hesitates, without seeing the keep, to question the statement as to Dover, but it is noteworthy that the large coupled windows are found at Dover at the third stage, but at the fourth in the Tower of London. One is tempted, therefore, to ask whether the third floor at Dover may not have really been two floors, of which the uppermost had only loops. The keep, as Mr. Clark observed, needs to be cleared out.

These volumes also fail at times, for the present day as for the Norman period, to be up to date. Careswell is described as belonging "now to the Duke of Cleveland," while the stately seat of Skipton Castle is said to have "continued till lately" in the possession of Sir Henry Jaques Tufton. It is still according to the peerages the seat of that gentleman (Lord Hothfield since 1881), who is here oddly styled the "descendant and representative" of the former owners. Enough has been said to show that, while this is a book for "the drawing-room table," the letterpress is devoid of all historical or archæological value. The illustrations, however, which are from photographs, will doubtless be attractive to many, though they are of somewhat unequal merit.

THE SOCIETY OF PAINTERS IN WATER COLOURS. SPECIAL EXHIBITION.

The "Old Society"—justly so called, because it is now nearly a hundred years since its first exhibition was opened—has closed its winter exhibition at an earlier date than usual, in order to put before the public, for a few weeks only, a most brilliant collection of drawings by its lately deceased members, Lord Leighton, and Mr. A. W. Hunt, Mr. G. A. Fripp, Mr. A. D. Fripp, Mr. E. K. Johnson, Mr. R. Beavis, and Mr. G. Du Maurier. It is so fine an exhibition that the reputation of the Society will undoubtedly be enhanced by this the first display of the kind that has occurred in this gallery. Owing, doubtless, to there being already two collections of Leighton's works open to the public, the Society's field of choice was extremely restricted; nevertheless, we hoped to find more here. There are but two drawings of importance: A Study (No. 270), a gift from Mr. Huish, of the Fine-Art Society, which really adorns Screen 1, and The Death of the First-Born (98), a beautiful and learned design, which is marked by the best qualities of the late President's work. It was made for a book illustration, and, as such, it is of the first class. In frame No. 97 there are some Sketches by the same hand.

The attractiveness of the collection is largely due to the sixty lovely drawings by A. W. Hunt, and, there being more than double the number of his works in the same medium (none in oil) at the Burlington Club, our admiration for his powers, resources, and industry is greatly increased. The very considerable array of fine drawings by the brothers Fripp also deserves the attention of those who admire accomplished and original art. Mr. E. K. Johnson's reputation will be enhanced by the best of his works before us, for they prove that, despite too obvious mannerisms and his weakness as a designer, he could produce charming pictures; and R. Beavis will at least lose nothing by the present display, although the selection had, perhaps, better have been less numerous. The specimens in colours by Du Maurier suffice to prove that, clever as he was as a sketcher with the pen, his pictorial abilities were surprisingly limited.

It is certainly a pity that the works of each painter are not placed together, as they might quite well have been; but we shall endeavour to notice the best specimens of each artist separately and briefly. The first pictures that catch the visitor's eye when he enters the gallery are Hunt's impressive mountain study The Miner's Path, Coniston (1); Cumberland Fells (2), which illustrates what seems to us the perfection of rock drawing and the most felicitous touch, firm and forthright, combined with a complete repertory of tints and very rare greys; and Robin Hood's Bay (3), the first of a number of exquisite studies from the same neighbourhood. No. 3 excels most of them in the beauty and delicacy of its aërial tints, in its harmonies of tone and tint, and its wonderful grading. Robin Hood's Bay (10) is in most of its elements almost as good, and it is, if possible, still more subtle in its coloration and tonality. No. 11, with the same title, presents one of the finest instances of aërial spaciousness that Hunt produced. The massive breadth and consummate delicacy of No. 15, another Robin Hood's Bay, even surpass what we knew the artist could achieve when Weaving the aërial fabric of the light.

In Glen Loch (17) there is rock drawing and painting fit to rival those of 'Cumberland Fells,' and the bronze-coloured pool is, in its way, most impressive. This picture also merits praise for its success in what used to be called "pencilling," and is among the most solid of Hunt's performances.

The seven proper colours chorded are exquisitely shown in Sunlit Rain, Warkworth (22), in which the veil of mist is delineated with the purest tints. The Abbey Lands (87), part of the Whitby coast, is depicted as if it were a huge matrix opal. The greys are marvellously varied, and the breadth and harmoniousness of the whole work are most striking. The shadows here, as well as in No. 95, Sonning, Early Summer, though as soft and broad as they well can be, are so charged with light reflected from the neighbouring brighter parts of the scene that we are sure that not even Turner could have reproduced their charm more faithfully or more subtly. Our notice of Hunt's works here must conclude with calling attention to his Sonning (6), Near Carnedd Dafydd (13), The Parthenon in sunlight (18), Berne (27), Bamborough from the South (36), Rokeby (104), Grasse (256), and Schloss Eltz (300). The last is not the finest and most powerful drawing of this noble subject that Hunt produced, yet, except in firmness, solidity, and clearness, it comes very near to being so. Space will not allow us to dwell upon the beauty of a score more of his drawings.

After Hunt's, the most charming works in this gallery are those of George Fripp. It is true they are different, they are much less resplendent, nor do they possess the same variety or fascination, yet they are extremely fine and original. Fripp's firm drawing, his extraordinary skill in foreshortening, as well as the breadth and simplicity of his style made his art classical, in the best sense of a much-abused term. The early Kidwelly Castle (77) is quite one of his masterpieces; so solid and simple is its style, so broad and pure its colour, that, as we said of it when exhibited here some years ago, no connoisseur would hesitate to say that it might delight a painter of ancient Greece. The fresco-like purity and brilliant harmonies of Fripp's tonality and colouring are conspicuous in this most remarkable instance of the manner in which a painter can, without ceasing to be true to nature, so ennoble every element of his subject as to become almost an eclectic, and yet in no way depart from veracity. On a few inches of paper Fripp could depict the expansiveness of a vast lake or moorland, the ruggedness of a storm-beaten hillside, or the serene reach of a sunlit river. Scuir na Gillian, Isle of Skye (99), a group of rugged peaks, a stream of the colour of steel, and a wide moor, all seen in pearly light, is a perfect example of Fripp's power of working in this manner. Indeed, nothing could be broader or purer. Corrie Etichan (101); On the Coupée, Sark (102), a well-known and very fine example; Burton Pool, Sussex (103); Castle Urquhart (109); Glen Coe (110); Windmill, Evening (113); A Hay-Cart (114); Steeple Farm (119), which in its beautiful style and spaciousness suggests David Cox; Cleeve Mill (132), a tender and perfectly solid drawing; Loch Ein (178); and Kilchurn Castle (184), one of Fripp's most characteristic productions, which is notable for the drawing of the crenellated peaks of the middle distance, may be mentioned to show, not only the subjects which the artist most affected, but also his power to deal with them in his own fine, grave, and learned manner. It may be said of him that, although his scale of tints and tones was unusually limited, he was a fine colourist, a master of light and shade, and an exquisite and searching draughtsman. Yet few have been more reserved in the use he made of the resources of the palette, and his art is artistic in a very high degree.

Slight departures from his characteristic methods may be noticed in a noble fresco-like picture of Manorbeer Castle (188), and still more distinctly in the very fine Lynton (190) and In the Vale of Nant-Francon (192), where the shadow projected athwart the vista of the rocky pass is a fine example of Fripp's feeling for nature, while the foreshortening of the hillside shows draughtsmanship of a remarkable kind. To these capital examples should be added Farm Buildings at Sonning (100), Swale Vale (115), Egglestone Abbey (117), and On the Coast of Sark (139).

Very different from the methods and moods of his brother were those of Alfred Downing Fripp. He is quite as well represented here as we could hope, and his works, although without the classic dignity and reticence which distinguish the art of his senior, assure him by their breadth and grace, their harmony and softness, an equal place in our regard. The earliest of his noteworthy contributions is No. 205, The Blind Piper, which combines, as all his works of the same epoch did, the faults, and but few of the merits, of G. Cattermole and Maclise, and hardly suggests the after career of the painter. In the serene and beautiful sentiment of Prawn Fishers (220), two men pulling their boat up the beach of Lulworth Cove, which Fripp warmly loved and often painted, we have some of the dignity and poetry of Samuel Palmer. Harlech Castle (217), though good, is not up to the mark of such fine efforts as Old Harry, Swanage (165). Durdle Door (162) is noteworthy for the lovely harmonies of those pale blue, grey, and silver tints which the artist so often and so successfully introduced. Lobster Pots (164), Evening in the Campagna (166), and The Shrimper Boy (168), motives which he repeated more than once, are the best instances here of Fripp's exquisite feeling for the beauty of the white calms which are a feature of the Dorsetshire coast. The unfinished Entrance to Lulworth (171) is a really choice landscape. With these we may class The Pond (174), Boy with Dog and Game (193), and The Edge of the Common (216).

A few rapid notes will do justice to the contributions of E. K. Johnson. We may begin with his Ducklings (30), which is pretty and cleverly drawn, although the charming girl in a white dress—without whom few of the painter's pieces would be recognizable—does not sit rightly upon the barrow behind her. The picture is, like many here, rather flat and monotonous. A Letter (35) is better, although more to be praised as a very crisp, bright, and laboured study of a white dress, with a tall, not too well-constructed girl inside, than as a picture in the proper sense of the word. Parts of it are, nevertheless, most carefully and completely studied. The series of Johnson's drawings suggests how beneficial close attention to Alfred Fripp's work in its feeling for breadth and harmony would have been to him. Memories (46) is, perhaps, the softest and richest in tone. No. 34, The Pet Rabbit, is flat, but in harmony with itself. Ponies in a Snowstorm (52) shows much good drawing and solid modelling; while Pot-pourri (72) is the work upon which Johnson's reputation will, fortunately for him, rest. Several of the drawings, although not the best of their class, exhibit his undeniable skill in painting flower gardens in sunlight.

MR. CHARLES PARSONS KNIGHT.

This able landscape painter, one of the modern leaders in the famous Bristol School, died at St. John's Wood, where he lived near his studio, on the evening of the 22nd inst. after long and severe suffering, brought on, it is understood, by a neglected cold acting upon a constitutional disposition to the stone. Born on February 15th, 1829, he was one of the sons of Canon Knight, of Bristol, the Rector of St. Michael's in that city, and a member of a family long and closely connected with the Church of England. Having been educated by his father, he was originally intended for the sea, and became a midshipman on board of Messrs. Green's liners; but a single voyage convinced him that the roughness of a sea life was by no means to his taste, and he quitted the service immediately on returning to England. Still this experience strengthened his love of the ocean as a subject for art, added to the knowledge of shipping and seamen he had previously obtained in Bristol and the Bristol Channel, and afforded him abundant opportunities for studying those cloud effects in depicting which Knight had but few superiors in this country, especially as regards the scientific aspects of sea and cloud surfaces. Determining to become an artist, and being then a ready if not an accomplished draughtsman, the young man pursued his studies under no regular master, but drew and painted zealously in the Life School of the Bristol Academy and elsewhere, as well as by the coasts and rivers of his native county and that of Devon. The harbour of Bristol and the devious reaches of the Avon possessed special attractions for him; and it was with paintings of them that Knight first appeared at the Bristol exhibition. In London he made his début at Suffolk Street in 1853 with a bright coast piece, entitled 'The Mumbles Head, Glamorganshire,' No. 581. It was followed in the same place by various pictures, all of which marked regular and considerable advance in skill and also in feeling for the true representation of light. His first contribution to the Academy was named 'Durham from the North,' No. 943 of 1857. This was succeeded by 'A Bit of Riverside,' 1858; 'Barley Harvest on the Welsh Coast,' 'A Bright Spring Day,' and other paintings of increasing value, until his position as one of the coming masters of his art was assured by the appearance in 1861 at Trafalgar Square of 'The Stone Walls of Old England, Speeton Cliffs, Yorkshire,' a brilliant and beautiful work, which attracted the attention of every visitor to the Academy. From this time till his death Knight continued to paint with unabated zeal and skill, but not, from some unexplained cause, with commensurate good fortune. Holding always an honourable place in his profession, he was much respected and liked by all who knew him; but, while artists admired his works, his popularity with the public did not equal his merits or his ambition, which aimed at a greater place than he attained. Disappointed as he was, a noble enthusiasm and sincere love of his art sustained him to the end, so that, even while failing health pressed upon him with increasing force, he ceased not to paint with persistent care and searching studies, and the large works which remain not quite finished on his easels are full of beauty and suggestion. His industry was so far remarkable that of the thirty-three works which he exhibited at the Academy—where, of late years at least, he was hardly treated—most of them were by no means small, and all were creditable to him. Including these, he exhibited in London 110 examples in all. Of these, those not at the Academy were in Suffolk Street, the New Gallery, the British Institution, and minor collections. His subjects were mostly derived from England, South Wales, and Scotland; commonly they were views of the coast, and so good were they as to justify the professional opinion that few equalled, fewer still surpassed Knight in drawing waves, in representing light reflected by water, or in delineating the rigging and hulls of ships.

Fine-Art Gossip.

Towards the end of next month the Fine-Art Society proposes to open a numerous collection embodying the best of the work of Du Maurier. About the same time the same body will submit to a public view many drawings made in Northern Italy during nearly three years by Mr. Wallace Rimington.

The Grafton Galleries, with a collection of works by Ford Madox Brown, were opened to the public on Wednesday last. About their leading contents we may have something to say in a week or two.

Many of our readers will be glad to know that Mr. G. H. Andrews, of the "Old Society" of Painters in Water Colours, who fractured his kneecap some weeks ago, is slowly recovering.

The Society of Lady Artists has appointed to-day (Saturday) for the private view of its productions in the gallery of the Society of British Artists. The public will be admitted on Monday next.

We have received from Mr. F. S. Waller a letter which is unfortunately too long for us to print entire, but from which we are glad to learn that no attempt has been made, or is to be made, to restore the reredos of the Lady Chapel of Gloucester Cathedral. It has only been covered up to keep the dust off it while part of the flooring is taken up. Mr. Waller explains that the portions of the tile floor at the west and east ends of the chapel have also been covered over. As to the remainder of the floor, Mr. Waller says:—

> "More than one-half of the original old tiled floor has ceased to exist for many years, the chapel having been made use of for interments in a manner seldom seen; not only have the bodies now lying here been buried in vaults, but burials have been made in plain wood coffins, as in churchyards, and these having decayed, the ground has been used again and again for like purposes. There are more than 50 flat stones recording deaths, some of people with their wives and children; probably as many as 150 may have found their last resting-place here, in a space not much larger than a good-sized dining-room. In such a case as this there could be no doubt as to the proper course to pursue for sanitary reasons alone, viz., to take up the monumental slabs, fill up the vaults, and then hermetically seal up the whole floor with concrete, which is now being done: a horrible and most repulsive task, as may be imagined from the description given above. One instance I must mention, that of a vault with four coffins in it, the topmost coffin just under, and touching, the memorial slab on which was the name of the deceased. When walking over this the living and the dead were therefore within six inches of each other, and open joints around the vaults were numerous. Of course all the monumental slabs will be put back again in the old positions as ordered by the Chapter."

We are much indebted to Mr. Waller for his explanations, and we are pleased to learn we were mistaken. As Mr. Pearson was said to be associated with the work, we presumed that "restoration" on an extensive scale was intended.

The press view of the Thirty-sixth Annual Exhibition of the Royal Glasgow Institute of the Fine Arts will take place on Thursday next.

Messrs. Christie, Manson & Woods sold on the 20th and 21st inst. the following etchings and engravings: After Meissonier, 'La Partie Perdue,' by F. Bracquemard, 27*l.*; another, 27*l.*; 'Le Guide,' by Achille Jacquet, 25*l.*; '1807,' Friedland, by Jules Jacquet, 79*l.*; '1806,' Jena, by Jules Jacquet, 40*l.*; 'Portrait of the Sergeant,' by Jules Jacquet, 42*l.* After Sir E. Landseer, 'The Shoeing,' by C. G. Lewis, 52*l.* A. H. Haig, 'Mont St. Michel,' 37*l.*

It is sad to hear that the Hôtel de Ville of Louvain is going to be restored. The cost, which is computed at about one million francs, will be defrayed in equal parts by the State and the town. This famous building suffered an extremely drastic "restoration" about fifty years ago.

The French papers announce the unexpected death of M. Lucien Doucet, a well-known painter whose promise was not half fulfilled. His works are chiefly portraits of great refinement and much beauty. He received a Third Class Medal in 1879, a Second Class one in 1887, Silver and Gold Medals at the Exhibition of 1889, and the Legion of Honour two years later.

The picture galleries of the Luxembourg have been closed for repairs, and will probably remain so for some time. The destruction of that part of the Palais de l'Industrie, Paris, which will for the last time be occupied by the Salon of 1897, has been begun. The Louvre has acquired from the Château de Chantelle, near Moulins, three statues of great interest, which, says the Chronique des Arts, had been, since the château was occupied as a convent, almost forgotten. They represent SS. Anne, Peter, and Susanna, are supposed to have been executed by the sculptor Clément Mauclerc for Anne de Beaujeu, wife of Pierre de Bourbon, and serve to fill a gap in the historical illustration of French sculpture.

MUSIC

THE WEEK.

Garrick Theatre.—Carl Rosa Opera: 'Faust,' 'Die Meistersinger,' 'Mignon,' 'Cavalleria Rusticana' and 'Pagliacci,' and 'Carmen.'
Albert Hall.—Royal Choral Society: Schubert's 'Song of Miriam' and 'Israel in Egypt.'
Highbury Athenæum.—Highbury Philharmonic Society.
Queen's Hall.—Mr. Gompertz's Quartet Concerts.

The performances of the Carl Rosa Company at the Garrick Theatre are continuing, on the whole, very satisfactorily. Only a few words of record are needed concerning 'Faust' on Thursday last week, with Mr. Brozel, Miss Alice Esty, Mr. Alec Marsh, and Mr. William Paull in the principal parts.

The most interesting night of the week was Friday, when Wagner's humorous masterpiece 'Die Meistersinger' was given in London for the first time in English. The most Shakspearean in humour of all operas is now a familiar item in the repertory of the company, and the principal members of the cast play together with commendable zeal and intelligence. Mr. Hedmondt, if not vocally perfect, was refined and gentlemanly in manner as Walther, and Miss Alice Esty was sufficiently arch and pleasant as Eva. Mr. Homer Lind's Beckmesser had many good points, but, like other artists who take this part, he seemed occasionally to forget that, although narrow and pedantic to the last degree, he is the town clerk of Nuremberg, and not a pantaloon. As Hans Sachs, Mr. Ludwig was admirable alike in voice and general bearing. Mr. Frank Wood's David was appropriately light and youthful; Mr. C. Tilbury as Pogner, Mr. William Paull as Kothner, and Miss Kirkby Lunn as Magdalena were all satisfactory; and Herr Eckhold had his orchestra and chorus well in hand. The performance of the most exhilarating of modern operas was very creditable to the company.

'Mignon,' on Saturday evening, was in the main pleasantly given. It was, of course, unfortunate that Miss Zélie de Lussan was unable, owing to illness, to undertake the principal part, but the indefatigable Miss Alice Esty filled her place charmingly in all respects. The part of Wilhelm is not powerful in an acting sense, and Mr. Robert Cunningham was quite equal to its vocal requirements. Such music as Thomas has written for Filina is more difficult than it was thirty years ago, when operatic sopranos had constantly to indulge in trills and florid passages; but Miss Bessie Macdonald sang it with fluency and grace. The other characters were competently represented.

On Monday the programme was filled by 'Cavalleria Rusticana' and 'Pagliacci.' These two familiar works were, of course, efficiently interpreted, for they have both been for a considerable period in the repertory of the Carl Rosa Company. The impersonations of Mr. Hedmondt, Madame Marie Duma, Miss Bessie Macdonald, and Mr. Brozel may be specially commended.

'Carmen' was performed on Tuesday with a fairly good cast. That clever artist Mlle. Pauline Joran, who can play the violin as well as she can sing and act, was the representative of the fickle gipsy, and Miss Bessie Macdonald was a charming Michaela. Mr. Hedmondt was appropriately dramatic as Don José, and the other parts were adequately interpreted. 'Lohengrin' was announced for Thursday evening, too late for notice this week; and a successful, but too brief season will close next Saturday.

We are now in the midst of the Schubert centenary celebrations, though up to the time of writing nothing of an important nature has been done. On Thursday last week at the Albert Hall the Royal Choral Society's performance of 'Israel in Egypt' was preceded by the Viennese master's 'Song of Miriam,' composed in the last year of his life, and written originally for soprano solo, chorus, and pianoforte accompaniment. The motet, which, curiously enough, reflects in a very slight degree Schubert's mature style, was orchestrated by his devoted admirer F. Lachner, and it has since been touched up by another hand. The solo part on this occasion was brilliantly rendered by Miss Esther Palliser. The performance of Handel's oratorio was chiefly remarkable for the more moderate tempi than those to which we were accustomed under Sir Joseph Barnby, particularly in the "Hailstone Chorus," and also for the restoration of the duet "The Lord is a man of war" to its original form for two voices, the artists, Messrs. Andrew Black and Watkin Mills, giving supreme satisfaction.

The second concert this season of the Highbury Philharmonic Society on Tuesday evening was in a double sense interesting. The first performance was given of a cantata, 'The Oak of Geismar,' by Mr. Erskine Allon, a well-read composer, of whom we have frequently spoken, though not in terms of unqualified praise, because his music seemed to proceed more from the head than the heart. Such a remark, however, would be unjust if applied to his new cantata, for it is written throughout in a pleasant, genial style, with orchestration perhaps more suggestive of the French than the German school. The subject is the familiar one of the conflict between heathenism and Christianity, the latter, of course, prevailing in the end; and after several interesting and melodious numbers the work concludes with a delightful Christmas carol. The principal characters are but three in number—Asulf, a young prince; Hunrad, a priest of Thor; and Wilfred, a Christian priest—and these were excellently interpreted by Miss Evangeline Florence, Mr. Ben Davies, and Mr. Bantock Pierpoint. The words, it should be said, are adapted by Miss Florence Perugini-Campbell from the story by Mr. Henry van Dyke of New York. Subsequently in the programme was presented for the first time in the north of London Prof. Villiers Stanford's Irish ballad 'Phaudrig Crohoore,' for chorus and orchestra, first produced at the Norwich Festival in October last. This piquant little work was rendered with much spirit, and, indeed, throughout the orchestra and chorus gave all possible satisfaction, the tone produced by the choir being not unworthy to compare with that of a contingent from Yorkshire. Mr. Gilbert H. Betjemann may be congratulated upon the increasing excellence of the forces under his control.

Mr. Richard Gompertz introduced Dvořák's String Quartet in A flat, Op. 105, for the first time in London at his fourth concert in the Queen's Small Hall on Wednesday evening. The work, which presumably, though not certainly, is a recent composition by the Bohemian composer, will add nothing to his reputation, but it will not detract therefrom. It is sufficiently Slavonic in phraseology, and the second movement, molto vivace, is decidedly charming. Beethoven's Quartet in A minor, Op. 132, concluded the programme, the ensemble in both works being little short of perfect. Mr. Gompertz was assisted, as at previous concerts, by Messrs. Haydn Inwards, Emil Kreuz, and Charles Ould. Brahms's beautiful Vocal Quartets, Op. 92, were well rendered by Mrs. Hutchinson, Madame Hope Glenn, Mr. Walter Ford, and Mr. Herbert Thorndike.

Musical Gossip.

Tschaïkowsky's early Quartet in D, Op. 11, was repeated at last Saturday's Popular Concert, and if it scarcely grows upon us on acquaintance, it is certainly not unworthy of the Russian composer, whose utterances seem to be more esteemed now that he is dead than when he was alive and at work. Beethoven's Sonata in D for pianoforte and violoncello, Op. 102, No. 2, was the only other concerted work, the executants being Miss Fanny Davies and Signor Piatti. Pianoforte trifles by Rubinstein were beautifully rendered by Miss Davies; and of course Lady Halle was unexceptionable in Prof. Stanford's three violin pieces, 'Hush Song,' 'A Lament,' and 'Reel.' Mr. Byard, a promising young baritone, who has studied abroad, was the vocalist.

No more than formal notice is required concerning Monday's programme, which commenced with Mozart's Quartet in B flat, known as No. 9, though really it is the last but one left by the master, and closed with Schumann's Sonata in A minor for pianoforte and violin, Op. 105, played by M. Slivinski and Lady Halle. Madame Bertha Moore was the vocalist.

The violin recital by Signora Teresina Tua (the Comtesse de Franchi-Verney) at St. James's Hall on Monday afternoon was an artistic success, for the young artist has greatly improved since she last appeared in London. She played Mendelssohn's Concerto with all needful vigour, and, what is even better, purity of intonation, and took part with Miss Fanny Davies in a perfect performance of Brahms's Sonata in A for pianoforte and violin, Op. 100.

Mr. Frederic Lamond, at his second pianoforte recital on Tuesday afternoon in St. James's Hall, gave an extremely intelligent performance of Beethoven's great Sonata in B flat, Op. 106, a work that has not been heard for some time. The programme likewise contained Schumann's 'Études Symphoniques,' and minor items by Chopin, Field, Henselt, and Liszt.

Much regret has doubtless already been felt at the announcement of the death of Madame Edith Wynne, who, although she had dropped out of notice during the last few years, was still held in cordial remembrance by amateurs. Madame Wynne was a welcome figure on the concert platform as a ballad, oratorio, or festival singer during the sixties and the early seventies, for, though not a powerful singer, her method and artistic perception generally were all that could be desired. She was married at the Chapel Royal, Savoy, in 1875, to Mr. A. Agabeg, barrister-at-law, and it is noteworthy that on this occasion some of the bridal music from 'Lohengrin,' which is now considered almost indispensable, was played for the first time at a wedding. The last occasion on which Madame Edith Wynne appeared in public was at Aberystwith in the summer of last year; but she was present at the performance of 'La Vivandière' at the Garrick Theatre so recently as Wednesday in last week.

THE Bohemian String Quartet will give two concerts, under the direction of Mr. Ernest Cavour, at the Queen's Small Hall, on February 19th and 23rd.

A THIRD performance of Saint-Saëns's 'Samson et Dalila' will be given at the Queen's Hall on Saturday afternoon, March 6th, with Miss Marie Brema, Mr. Edward Lloyd, and Mr. Andrew Black as the principal vocalists.

MR. LOUIS H. HILLIER, the Belgian composer and violinist, announces his third annual concert, taking place under the direction of Mr. Ernest Cavour at St. James's Hall, on March 12th. Besides the Hillier Belgian String Quartet, which will perform for the first time quartets of the new Russian School, Mlle. Berthe Balthasar (twelve years old), pianist; Miss Marie Cabrera, mezzo-soprano; and Miss Constance Bolton, contralto, will make their first appearance. Mlle. Irma Sethe will play three novelties by the concert-giver.

DRAMA

RECENT PLAYS.

The Charm, and other Drawing-Room Plays. By Walter Besant and Walter Pollock. (Chatto & Windus.)—It is difficult in the case of this new Beaumont and Fletcher to assign to the dramatists their respective shares in the work which is their joint production. We are disposed to regard Mr. Pollock, though his name comes second, as the master spirit. There is at least in the volume little that reminds us of the firm grip noticeable in works such as 'Ready-Money Mortiboy' or 'The Golden Butterfly,' and much that recalls the lighter style of Mr. Pollock in his levers de rideau, imitated often, but not always, from those of the Comédie Française. Of the eight plays now presented to meet the large and ever-augmenting demand for drawing-room entertainments one only—'The Spy,' which presents a supposed episode of the Vendéan rising—is serious and melodramatic. Most of the pieces are domestic interiors not less pleasing than edifying to contemplate, and wholly suited to their purpose. A certain amount of fantasy attaches to 'The Charm,' the first and the most ambitious of the works. In this (the moral of which is that though "youth and crabbed age cannot live together," "crabbed age" has delights of its own, and gets on well and pleasantly with itself) the scene is a Parisian salon in the latter half of the eighteenth century. By the agency of a species of Cagliostro, the Princess and the Marchioness, two ladies of venerable age, have their youth restored to them. They refuse to rejuvenate, however, their no less venerable lovers, and devote themselves to the cult of new and youthful loves. The experiment is thus in a sense disastrous, and by another magical touch the mesmerist or miracle-monger restores them to their pristine condition. A similar vein of gentle cynicism runs through 'The Voice of Love.' Nothing but the informing touch of love is wanting to render a youthful débutante an ideal Juliet. Love comes, but mistakes his mission, and, to the despair of a kind-hearted old Michonnet of a tutor, takes away from the stage for conjugal delight and pursuits the half-fledged or unfledged artist. 'Peer and Heiress' shows some scenes of pretty wooing between Englishmen and American maidens, in which happy nuptials are deferred because one lady erroneously believes her suitor to be a peer, while he no less gratuitously credits her with being an heiress. 'The Shrinking Shoe' is an amusing and ingenious modernization of 'Othello.' 'The Glove' tells a pleasant story, the action of which immediately precedes the Restoration, which brings with it a happy dénoûment and uses effectively the song:—

> Then look for no peace, for the war shall never cease,
> Till the king shall come to his own again.

'The Wife's Confession,' with which the volume concludes, shows a generous husband realizing the truth and worth of his wife, and saving her from a humiliating revelation thrust malignantly upon her. The volume, which serves its purpose well, is agreeably illustrated.

Fairy Plays and how to Act Them. By Mrs. Hugh Bell. (Longmans & Co.)—A dozen or more fairy stories—many of which have served for pantomimes, while others, such as 'The Emperor's New Clothes,' have formed the basis of comedies—have been dramatized for children by Mrs. Hugh Bell, who has had much practice of the sort. Superfluous pains have been taken to modernize the language and to remove all trace of fantasy. In other respects the arrangement is to be commended. What is of most value in the volume consists of the opening directions how to play the pieces and provide the appointments. These are very sensible and practical, and include directions for dances by Mrs. Marshall-Burch, of Queen's College, Harley Street. Music to the various songs is supplied. The volume is profusely illustrated by Mr. Lancelot Speed, and, apart from its claim upon the attention of juvenile amateurs, constitutes an eminently attractive and a readable gift-book.

Short Plays and Charades. By Mrs. Irwine Whitty. (Skeffington & Son.)—These plays, intended for drawing-room and parish entertainments, are simple in story and treatment, are principally rhymed, and deal with domestic subjects. They are fitted for their purpose, and may be acted almost without scenery or preparation.

Dramatic Gossip.

Now that it has passed into the hands of Mr. Arthur Collins, the management of Drury Lane Theatre will be, so far as is possible, controlled by the traditions of Sir Augustus Harris, whose counsellor and, in some respects, right-hand man Mr. Collins has been during some years.

DADDY HARDACRE, in the Olympic version of 'La Fille de l'Avare,' is so closely associated with the fame of Robson that one hears with interest as well as surprise that the part will shortly be taken by Mr. Charles Cartwright, who is best known, up to now, in melodrama.

MR. AND MRS. ARTHUR BOURCHIER, Miss Violet Vanbrugh, Miss Irene Vanbrugh, Mr. Blakeley, and other members of the company recently playing at the Royalty, have arrived from America, the tour having broken down in consequence of the illness of Mrs. Bourchier.

IN the revival on Saturday night at the Lyceum of 'Cymbeline,' Miss Terry reappeared as Imogen. Mr. Cooper Cliffe replaced Sir Henry Irving as Iachimo. The only other noteworthy change in the cast consisted in the substitution of Mr. Martin Harvey for Mr. Gordon Craig as Arviragus.

'SLEEPING DOGS,' a farcical comedy by Mr. Mark Melford, has been produced at the New Theatre, Cambridge.

ON Monday afternoon at the Prince of Wales's Miss "Kitty" Loftus replaced Madame Germaine Ety as Louisette in 'A Pierrot's Life.'

MR. ROBERT BUCHANAN and his customary associate, "Charles Marlowe," have written a drama on the subject of Nelson to be called 'The Mariners of England.' It includes a spectacular presentation of the battle of Trafalgar. Its speedy performance in London is anticipated.

THE revival on Friday afternoon last week at the Criterion of Robertson's 'Society' proves the value of that piece to have been marvellously overrated. It is a poor, eminently artificial, and not wholly sympathetic play, the success of which on its first production seems no longer easy of explanation. Miss Rose Leclercq's Lady Ptarmigant was good. Mr. Righton was Lord Ptarmigant, Mr. Kemble the elder Chodd, and Miss Laura Graves the heroine. Messrs. Brookfield, Farquhar, and others played with spirit the members of the Owls' Roost, but the general performance had little to commend it.

THE promised performance at the Globe of 'An Irish Gentleman' has been postponed, and the first novelty at that house will, according to recent arrangements, consist of 'Bonny Boy Blue,' a comedy by Mr. T. G. Warren, which has already been seen at an afternoon performance.

MISS EVELYN MILLARD has written to contradict the report that she had taken the Royalty Theatre for the purpose of producing Mr. Louis Parker's new play, 'The Mayflower.'

MISS PHYLLIS BROUGHTON now plays the part of Josephine (originally taken by Miss Florence Lloyd) in 'Round a Tree,' the opening piece at the Vaudeville.

THE Court Theatre will, as at present arranged, reopen in a week or so under Mr. Arthur Chudleigh with 'Sweet Nancy,' in which Miss Annie Hughes will reappear as the heroine. The cast will differ little from that with which the piece was revived recently for a solitary occasion at the Criterion. A one-act play by Mrs. Oscar Beringer, entitled 'A Bit of Old Chelsea,' will be the opening piece. In this Miss Annie Hughes and Mr. Edmund Maurice will play the principal parts.

WE hear with regret of the death of Mrs. James Carden, professionally known as Miss Marston Leigh, the youngest daughter of the late J. A. Heraud, and the sister of Miss Edith Heraud. A well-known member of Miss Marriott's company at Sadler's Wells, she played ingénue parts, and was specially excellent as Ophelia. She was subsequently seen at Drury Lane and the Adelphi. At the latter house she played Geraldine in 'Green Bushes.' In her twenty-second year she married J. L. Warner, a son of the celebrated Mrs. Warner, and on his death espoused Mr. James Carden, with whom she went to America. She died in Philadelphia on the 6th inst.

HAMLET'S assertion "They do but jest, poison in jest," does not hold always good. An audience at the theatre at Arad in Hungary had a novel and painful experience. An actor named Balla, personating a character who commits suicide with a pistol, played the part in earnest, and, having summoned his friends to witness him act his best, killed himself on the stage in the manner indicated.

IN the DAY of BATTLE: a Romance. By JOHN A. STEUART, Author of 'Kilgroom: a Story of Ireland,' &c.

"A brisk breezy tale of adventure which, once begun, is not laid aside readily. The story moves, it carries th reader on from page to page under the influence of an excitement which rarely fails. Mr. Steuart writes throughout in good nervous English, and has a pretty faculty of description."—National Observer.

The HONOUR of SAVELLI: an Historical Romance. By S. LEVETT YEATS.

"'The Honour of Savelli' is a story of adventure pure and simple, the hero being an Italian soldier of fortune of the early sixteenth century; and although the author modestly disclaims all comparisons with the most popular contemporary exponent of this school of fiction, he has little to learn from Mr Weyman or any one else in the art of vivid, straightforward narrative....The book is a first-rate piece of work, and holds the reader enchained from the sensational outset to the very last page."—Athenæum.

Opinions of the Leading Dailies on Mr. W. CAREW HAZLITT'S New Book, FOUR GENERATIONS of a LITERARY FAMILY, 3 vols. 31s. 6d. net.

"The family has secured for itself a sufficiently enduring place in the history of modern literature to make personal gossip of the kind collected in 'Four Generations' acceptable to a wide circle..... Yet the volumes, taken as a whole, are well worth reading, and are not without value as a contribution to literary and social history."—[Standard, Jan. 18.] "Miss Marie Corelli, we believe, recently published a list of 'People I Dislike.' The curious might make an interesting anthology under the same heading from these two volumes of Mr. Hazlitt's. He hits all round."—[Daily Chronicle, Jan. 18.] "In spite of these conspicuous defects, which after all merely show that the old Hazlitt bitterness survives in 'the fourth generations,' Mr. Hazlitt's book contains, with plenty of chaff, good store of appetizing grain."—[Pall Mall Gazette, Jan. 18.] "The careful and judicious reader will pick out of this work a few things really entertaining or instructive; but he will not be in a position to admire in the author either much literary skill or invariable good taste.....Mr. Hazlitt's own reminiscences are varied as well as extensive, but cluster mainly round denizens of the literary and artistic worlds."—[Globe, Jan. 19.] "The book is full of idle, ill-natured, and often malicious gossip about all sorts of people, public and private, with whom the author has ever come in contact. He spares neither his father's friends nor his own; and regards neither the memory of the dead nor the feelings of the living."—[Scotsman, Jan. 18.] "It would have been impossible for any one writing, on such a subject as Mr. Carew Hazlitt has chosen, and with the special advantages which he possesses for the treatment of it, to produce a book devoid of value and interest."—[Glasgow Herald, Jan. 21.] "A book that is not merely interesting, but fascinating as well.....Certain to provoke a good deal of hostile criticism, because of its cynical and even brutal outspokenness."—[North British Daily Mail, Jan. 19.] "We do not say that there are no stories worth repeating, and some of the chapters are sufficiently pleasant reading."—[Times, Jan. 21.] "The reader will find here many interesting glimpses of notable persons, and much entertaining matter about bygone phases of manners."—[Daily News, Jan. 18.] "Mr. Hazlitt chats discursively, but with points that are worth the labour of picking out, on 'Our Club,' where Jerrold, Shirley Brooks, the younger Dickens, Dr. Richardson, Henry Holl, Sir George Jessel, Chas. Knight, Hepworth Dixon, Masson, Robert Keeley, Richard Weekes, and Hazlitt père foregathered; on Sotheby's and other auction rooms, of which he has been a diligent frequenter; on the British Museum reading-room, and the strange sights that may be seen under the dome; on Chelsea bun-houses; on the Bohemianism of the old Parliamentary gallery; on the free-list system; on actors, writers, publishers, all sorts and conditions of men, whom he has known at first or, at least, at second hand. Interesting reminiscences and good stories come thick and fast in places. It is a medley from which few will not find several score of things to remember and tell at table."—[Pall Mall Gazette, Jan. 18.]

ROBERT BUCHANAN'S ADDRESS TO BOOK-BUYERS.

JANUARY, 1897.

The experiment of issuing my own books, which I began not quite a year ago, has quite realized my modest expectations. Although there has been no great rush to Gerrard-street, the sales have been fairly satisfactory. The small stock of my published works, which I took over from Messrs. Charto & Windus, is entirely exhausted, and I receive by every post letters inquiring about the new and cheaper editions now in preparation. The one new book, with which I began operations,

THE DEVIL'S CASE:

A Bank Holiday Interlude,

has had just the reception I anticipated, and quite as large a sale as I could have hoped for. Most people, very naturally, preferred the Case according to Archdeacon Farrar and Miss Corelli. While the majority of Critics set the book down as the production of a Lunatic or of a once respectable Poet whose intellectual powers are paralyzed (see the Daily News and the Nonconformist Conscience passim), a few more charitable reviewers admitted its cleverness, while deploring its irreverence.

Only one thing in connexion with this publication has caused me real surprise. I knew Logrollia too well to expect any rational treatment there, but I did expect a little sane consideration in my native land. There was a time when Scotland had brains of its own; now its culture seems to be only a weak reflection of the rushlights of Clapham. One journalist, however, in the North British Daily Mail, had the courage to write as follows:—

"There is the sting of truth hiding behind all the invective of Mr. Buchanan. Were it not for the succession of mental shocks received by the reader at every fresh blasphemy of the poet, most men could enjoy and benefit from Mr. Buchanan's (or the Devil's) gospel, which is at least thoroughly practical." And the same authority avowed that I was "an earnest, nay a reverent" writer, in the midst of all my "irreverences." Which is only the fact, for I am the only surviving Religious Poet, and am possibly the last of the race!

With the view of further establishing my claim to this lugubrious distinction, I am about to publish two new Books of Poetry:

(I.)

THE BALLAD OF MARY THE MOTHER:

A Christmas Carol,

at the end of which book will be printed a Sonnet-sequence addressed to the Madonna; and

(II.)

THE NEW ROME:

Ballads and Poems of Our Empire.

Both these works will be illustrated, partly by my own hand.

In the mean time I am issuing the FIRST CHEAP EDITION (price 4*s.* 6*d.* net, with most of the original illustrations) of that not-yet-well-enough-known book of mine,

THE OUTCAST:

A Rhyme for the Time, which a London critic (Mr. Traill, I think it was) described as "skittish." It is a work as yet incomplete, but perfectly coherent in itself, and it is livelier in manner than some of my writings. Simultaneously with it appears the FIRST CHEAP EDITION (price 2*s.* 6*d.* net) of a humorous book which ran through many editions when it was first published anonymously,

ST. ABE AND HIS SEVEN WIVES:

A Tale of Salt Lake City.

This new edition contains an amusing bibliographical note and the (afterwards suppressed) anticipatory criticisms.

For details of my other publications I must refer Book-buyers to my List, sent post free on application. Every work contained in it is written as well as published by me, with the single exception of the new prose tale by the Author of 'The Queen of Connaught.'

THE STRANGE ADVENTURES OF MISS BROWN,

By CHARLES MARLOWE, will be published (long 8vo. price 3*s.* 6*d.*) on Monday next, February 1st. On this story was founded the well-known farcical comedy of the same name, still running successfully in England and America.

JOHN FRANCIS AND THE 'ATHENÆUM.'

By JOHN C. FRANCIS.

"A fascinating page of literary history."
Illustrated London News.

"This literary chronicle of half a century must at once, or in course of a short time, take a place as a permanent work of reference."
Publishers' Circular.

"The entire work affords a comprehensive view of the intellectual life of the period it covers, which will be found extremely helpful by students of English literature."—Christian World.

"A worthy monument of the development of literature during the last fifty years.....The volumes contain not a little specially interesting to Scotsmen."—Scotsman.

"We have put before us a valuable collection of materials for the future history of the Victorian era of English literature."—Standard.

"The thought of compiling these volumes was a happy one, and it has been ably carried out by Mr. John C. Francis, the son of the veteran publisher."
Literary World.

"The volumes abound with curious and interesting statements, and in bringing before the public the most notable features of a distinguished journal from its infancy almost to the present hour, Mr. Francis deserves the thanks of all readers interested in literature."—Spectator.

"It was a happy thought in this age of jubilees to associate with a literary chronicle of the last fifty years a biographical sketch of the life of John Francis.....As we glance through the contents there is scarcely a page which does not induce us to stop and read about the men and events that are summoned again before us."—Western Daily Mercury.

"The book is, in fact, as it is described, a literary chronicle of the period with which it deals, and a chronicle put together with as much skill as taste and discrimination. The information given about notable people of the past is always interesting and often piquant, while it rarely fails to throw some new light on the individuality of the person to whom it refers."—Liverpool Daily Post.

"It is in characters so sterling and admirable as this that the real strength of a nation lies.....The public will find in the book reading which, if light and easy, is also full of interest and suggestion..... We suspect that writers for the daily and weekly papers will find out that it is convenient to keep these volumes of handy size, and each having its own index, extending the one to 20 the other to 30 pages, at their elbow for reference."
Liverpool Mercury.

"No memoir of Mr. Francis would be complete without a corresponding history of the journal with which his name will for ever be identified.....The extraordinary variety of subjects and persons referred to, embracing as they do every event in literature, and referring to every person of distinction in science or letters, is a record of such magnitude that we can only indicate its outlines. To the literary historian the volumes will be of incalculable service."
Bookseller.

"Our survey has been unavoidably confined almost exclusively to the first volume; indeed, anything like an adequate account of the book is impossible, for it may be described as a history in notes of the literature of the period with which it deals. We confess that we have been able to find very few pages altogether barren of interest, and by far the larger portion of the book will be found irresistibly attractive by all who care anything for the history of literature in our own time."
Manchester Examiner.

BLICKENSDERFER TYPE-WRITER.
It is NOT a reproduction or hash-up of any existing machines on which the patents have run out.
It is NOT an IMPROVEMENT on them.
It is an entirely new departure in Type-writer mechanism. The root idea in its construction is simplicity; in place of 2 to 3,000 parts it has only about 200. As a result of this simplicity we have a machine which is
PORTABLE (weight 6lb.), SPEEDY, DURABLE, and CHEAP.
It has a complete Key-board, with 84 Letters and Characters. It is fully warranted, and yet it is sold for

"As a story the book will charm as much as its teaching will profit. In point of plot, incident, surprise, and descriptive power, it is not a whit behind any of Mr. Hocking's previous works, and that is saying a good deal. The author is a born story-teller; but what strikes us even more than his power to rivet the attention of his readers is the great moral earnestness by which he is consumed."
Free Methodist.

BY THE SAME AUTHOR.

ALL MEN ARE LIARS.

"This is a notable book; thoughtful people will be fascinated by its actuality, its fearlessness, and the insight it gives into the influence of modern thought and literature upon the minds and morals of our most promising manhood."—Christian World.

ISHMAEL PENGELLY:

AN OUTCAST.

"The characters are admirably drawn.....An extremely vigorous, healthful, and interesting tale."—Academy.

THE STORY OF ANDREW FAIRFAX.

"Rustic scenes and characters are drawn with free, broad touches, without Mr. Buchanan's artificiality, and, if we may venture to say it, with more idealism than in Mr. Hardy's country pictures."—Manchester Examiner.

THE MONK OF MAR-SABA.

"Mr. Hocking has undoubtedly the power of telling a stirring incident well, and he gives one the impression of being pervaded by moral earnestness."—Spectator.

JABEZ EASTERBROOK.

"A book that can be read with interest and profit. A clever story cleverly told."—Record.

ZILLAH: a Romance.

"The interest, as the plot unravels, is thrilling."—Rock.

ETHEL TURNER'S WORKS.

Third Edition now ready, crown 8vo. cloth gilt, 3s. 6d.

THE LITTLE LARRIKIN.

"This is a most delightful, pathetic, and humorous—yet neither too pathetic nor too humorous—story."—Spectator.

"The character of Lol is exquisitely drawn, and the sayings and doings of the curly-headed little wag furnish the material for some of the most amusingly delightful pages of the book."—Western Daily Press.

"So brightly written, and so full of delicate touches of both humour and pathos."—Pall Mall Gazette.

"An exceedingly clever and amusing story."
St. James's Gazette.

BY THE SAME AUTHOR.

SIXTH EDITION.

SEVEN LITTLE AUSTRALIANS.

"Ought to capture hearts young and old as 'Helen's Babies' captured them. A book which both children and adults will love."—Queen.

FOURTH EDITION.

THE FAMILY AT MISRULE.

"Its charm consists in its simple and natural style, its mingled fun and pathos, and in the delineation of the characters."—Standard.

TEN SPLENDID 5s. NOVELS.

GUY BOOTHBY'S NEW NOVEL.

FOURTH EDITION NOW READY.

Crown 8vo. cloth, 5s.

DR. NIKOLA.

"One hairbreadth escape succeeds another with rapidity that scarce leaves the reader breathing space.....The interest of their experience is sufficient to stay criticism and carry him through a story ingeniously invented and skilfully told."—Scotsman.

"A most thrilling story throughout, manly and brave, and Sherlock Holmes has at last found a successor."
Glasgow Herald.

BY THE SAME AUTHOR.

BEAUTIFUL WHITE DEVIL.

SIXTH EDITION NOW READY.

"A more exciting romance no one could reasonably ask for."—Yorkshire Post.

"Mr. Boothby has conceived an original idea and worked it out in original fashion.....A capital book."—Globe.

A BID FOR FORTUNE.

"He never allows the interest to drop from first page to last.....The plot is highly ingenious, and when once it has fairly thickened, exciting to a degree."—Times.

IN STRANGE COMPANY.

The MARRIAGE of ESTHER.

BY ARTHUR MORRISON,
Author of 'Tales of Mean Streets' and 'A Child of the Jago.'

MARTIN HEWITT, Investigator.

CHRONICLES OF MARTIN HEWITT.

ADVENTURES OF MARTIN HEWITT.

"The ingenuity and skill with which he unravels the threads and puts his finger on criminals are altogether exceptional."—Standard.

"He has a very pretty skill in unravelling mysteries, and even when he fails he displays an infinite amount of acumen and resource..... Have a certain literary excellence which is not often to be met with in works of this class."—Bookman.

BY FRANCIS PREVOST.

RUST OF GOLD.

Art canvas, 5s.

"A series of fin de siècle stories of great power and picturesqueness.....As word pictures they are simply masterpieces."—Daily Telegraph.

ON THE VERGE.

"His dialogues sparkle with epigrammatic brilliancy..... An infinite charm about them."—Pall Mall Gazette.

Just ready, crown 8vo. buckram, 5s.

AT RANDOM. By L. F. Austin. With Photogravure Portrait of the Author.

"Mr. Louis Austin's dainty little volume, dainty in intellectual intention, and externally as comely a specimen of the bookbinder's art as you may desire.....In short, a delightful book—a book which can be taken in exhilarating sips from time to time, and read through in an hour or two with infinite profit."—Sketch.

NEW BOOK BY MRS. LOUISE CHANDLER MOULTON.—Crown 8vo. cloth gilt, 6s.

LAZY TOURS. By Mrs. Louise Chandler Moulton, Author of 'Bedtime Stories,'

'Swallows' Flights,' &c.

"Mrs. Moulton has ideas, and the courage of them, and they leap to light in artistic criticism and sometimes in subtle appreciation of much more than the mere pageants of life."
"Compels us to read her book from cover to cover.....A fresh enchantment is also given as we wander with Mrs. Moulton."—Daily Chronicle. Speaker.
"Not a dull line. On every page are scattered pretty phrases, jewelled sentences, and gems of biography or description.....Can you imagine stories better told? A book as gracious and interesting as any we have read this year."—Echo.

JARROLD & SONS' NEW NOVELS

NOW READY AT ALL LIBRARIES.

BY MAURUS JOKAI.

The GREEN BOOK; or, Freedom under the Snow. By Dr. MAURUS JOKAI. Translated by Mrs. WAUGH (ELLIS WRIGHT). With Engraved Portrait of Dr. Jókai (Authorized Edition). Cr. 8vo. art linen, gilt top, 6*s.*

"'The Green Book' is an historical romance of the early part of the century, and depicts in a graphic and sometimes lurid manner the political life of Russia during the conspiracies of 1824 and 1825. Pushkin, the well-known Russian poet, is the hero of the book, and the majority of male characters, at least, are personages who figured in the stirring events of the time. At a moment when Russia and things Russian figure so largely in the public press, and exercise so powerful a sway over the national imagination, the publication of this brilliant picture of Russian Society will be specially opportune."

BY SARAH TYTLER.

LADY JEAN'S SON. By Sarah TYTLER, Author of 'Lady Jean's Vagaries,' 'The Bride's Pass,' 'Lady Bell,' 'Buried Diamonds,' &c. Crown 8vo. art linen, gilt top, 6*s.*

"The glimpses of Edinburgh Society, while the Northern Athens was still the seat of fashion, are lifelike and clever. 'Lady Jean's Son' is from first to last a delightful story."
Pall Mall Gazette.

BY FLORENCE WARDEN.

The INN by the SHORE. By FLORENCE WARDEN. FOURTH EDITION. Crown 8vo. art linen, gilt top, 6*s.*

"Miss Florence Warden is unrivalled in a certain department of fiction. 'The Inn by the Shore' exhibits her at her best. It is full of marvellous mystery, and the clue to the mystery is exceedingly difficult to find in advance."
Academy.

BY MAURUS JOKAI.

BLACK DIAMONDS. By Maurus JOKAI. THIRD EDITION. Crown 8vo. art linen, gilt top, 6*s.*

"It is so well written, so abounding in all sorts of special knowledge, and displays so much real literary power, that we never feel tempted to leave any of its pages unread. There are some extremely fine descriptive passages in the book.....Maurus Jókai is absolutely original in thought and treatment."—Daily Chronicle.

London: JARROLD & SONS, 10 and 11, Warwick-lane, E.C.; and of all Booksellers.

STUDIES IN HEBREW PROPER NAMES.

BY

G. BUCHANAN GRAY, M.A.,

Lecturer in Hebrew and Old Testament Theology in Mansfield College.

Crown 8vo. cloth, price 7*s.* 6*d.* net.

"Excepting the cuneiform inscriptions, Mr. Gray notices for his arguments all the cognate Semitic languages found in the 'Corpus Inscriptionum Semiticarum,' as well as in monographs. This we may say without exaggeration, that Mr. Gray is thoroughly up to date. We hope that Biblical scholars, as well as students of the history of religion, and also folk-lorists, will avail themselves of the assistance which our author gives them."—Guardian.

"Is lucid and critical, and bears full evidence of Mr. Gray's wide and careful reading. The book is not merely a dictionary of proper names, with their derivations, but an attempt is made, and in our opinion successfully made, to test the religious ideas prevalent in each period of Old Testament history by the proper names most in vogue in that period."—Manchester Guardian.

"A valuable contribution to the investigation of a subject which has hardly received the attention it deserves."—Scotsman.

"It is not only the most elaborate treatment that the subject has received since criticism won its modern rights, but the author's exposition is so skilful that the reader hardly realizes how intricate the argument often is. The appendices to the book are very elaborate. Altogether, Mr. Buchanan Gray has placed himself in the front rank of Biblical scholars by this able and delightful book. Every page shows the width of the author's learning and the depth of his conscientiousness."
Jewish Chronicle.

"We have before us now a book which in range and accuracy far surpasses anything which has been attempted in English hitherto, and which promises to be a standard work upon the subject. Its method is so admirable, and some of its conclusions so sound and interesting, that no intelligent student of the Old Testament can afford to neglect it."—Christian World.

"This is the kind of work that is giving our universities of to-day a name for scholarship all the world over. There is not a student of the Old Testament in Hebrew but will find it indispensable."
Expository Times.

"Instead of spinning ingenious theories out of his own fancy, the author rests everywhere on a firm basis of fact, and constructs his theories with true scientific caution. We are glad to be able to recommend this work to all of our readers who have any knowledge of Hebrew. Even with a very elementary knowledge an intelligent reader would be able to follow the argument with understanding."
Primitive Methodist Quarterly Review.

A. & C. BLACK, Soho-square, London.

SIR GEORGE ROBERTSON'S BOOK.

THE KAFIRS OF THE HINDU-KUSH.

By Sir GEORGE SCOTT ROBERTSON, K.C.S.I.

With numerous Illustrations by A. D. McCormick.

Royal 8vo. 1*l.* 11*s.* 6*d.*

"We have all agreed to do honour to Sir George Scott Robertson for his heroic defence of Chitral; but the journey described in his book on the Kafirs of the Hindu-Kush seems to have been a still more valiant enterprise. His adventurous journey and his splendid courage and resourcefulness, which shine through all the modesty of his narrative, deserve the encomiums of every English reader who makes their acquaintance."—World.

"This book is in every sense remarkable. As a tale of adventure it is of the first order. As an unintentional exposition of a powerful personality, it is rare and almost unique. As a mine of anthropological lore it possesses a priceless and ever-increasing value. It is a book for readers of many kinds, and for every library of standard literature."
British Review.

A NOVEL TO READ.

AN ERRING PILGRIMAGE.

By NOEL AINSLIE. Crown 8vo. 6*s.*

"Noel Ainslie has a distinct gift for lively writing, and the story holds the reader to the end.....The writer is clever enough to put her characters into rather risky situations, and bring them out in a successful and even original manner."
St. James's Gazette.

"Drawn with capacity and conviction."
Athenæum.

"There are an insight and delicacy in the delineation which deserve high praise and are of themselves enough to make the success of the book."
Daily Chronicle.

"The author has a keen sense of the pathos of life."—Glasgow Herald.

"There is marked ability in it; and beneath a cynicism which is only superficial a great deal of sympathy and of insight."—Bookman.

"The book is able. The writer has a grasp of many kinds of human nature."—Sketch.

"We understand that 'An Erring Pilgrimage' is Noel Ainslie's first book; and there is so much that is good in it that the fact is worth noting.....Altogether it is a clever story, told in a lively manner, and one which is full of promise."—Academy.

"The diagnosis of the female characters in Noel Ainslie's book forbids us to regard the author as a mere man, though if she be a woman, her knowledge of certain masculine weaknesses is equally conspicuous and unusual."—National Observer.

"Shows such a mastery of analysis that it may be recommended to those people who read to be interested and not merely to be amused."
New Saturday.

MR. JACOBS'S STORIES.

MANY CARGOES.

By W. W. JACOBS. Crown 8vo. 3*s.* 6*d.*

[New Edition now ready.

"I have never heard of Mr. W. W. Jacobs before, and for anything I know this may be his first literary venture, but I can only say that the sooner he puts to sea again and brings back more cargoes of the same goods the better I shall be pleased."
THE BARON in Punch.

"The book consists of many stories, and one wishes them all longer and that there were more of them."—Pall Mall Gazette.

"You will most certainly enjoy the screaming farce of Mr. W. W. Jacobs's 'Many Cargoes.'" Truth.

"There is not a dull story in Mr. Jacobs's budget."—Referee.

"The reader is again and again convulsed with uncontrollable laughter as he is confronted with clever repartee and sparkling witticism."
St. James's Gazette.

THE NEW (TENTH) VOLUME OF BOOK PRICES CURRENT.

Being a Record of the Prices at which Books have been Sold at Auction, with the Titles and Descriptions in Full, the Catalogue Numbers, and the Names of the Purchasers from December, 1895, to November, 1896.

 The new Volume contains, for the first time in the history of BOOK PRICES CURRENT, a Subject Index of an extensive character; and a large number of entries, which seemed to stand in need of elucidation or explanation, have been carefully annotated, either Bibliographically or Historically, and collations of many of the books have also been given.

"If the editor of 'Book Prices Current' will only continue and amplify the excellent work he has commenced in this new volume, he will earn, if not a pension from an unbibliographical Government, at all events the gratitude of many hundreds of fellow-labourers in this most unremunerative branch of literary work."—Daily Chronicle.

"More than ever 'Book Prices Current' is not only acceptable, but necessary, to every buyer of books outside the common ruck. To the connoisseur and the collector it is invaluable. A subject index has been added. This latter feature is particularly welcome."—Globe.

"This work has been called the Whittaker's Almanack of book-buyers and booksellers—an admirable description. The ten volumes form a regular book collector's encyclopædia, and are an indispensable adjunct to the librarian's reference shelf. The tenth volume presents some new features, the most noticeable being the extensive subject index which is now provided for the first time."—Publishers' Circular.

THE NEW WELSH STORY.

GWEN and GWLADYS. A Story of Old Welsh

Village Life. By WILLIAM REES, D.D. (Gwilym Hiraethog). Translated from the Welsh by W. REES EVANS.

"A most delightful study of old Welsh village life and character. The narrative takes the form of reminiscences of 'an old Welsh tailor from a country parish in North Wales.' There is something very invigorating, some breath of fresh and uncontaminated air, about these pages to any one who has sickened of the 'Problem-novel' and other modern fare usually provided for us by the modern publisher."—Public Opinion.

In crown 8vo. in art canvas, price 5*s.* net, illustrated with Facsimiles and Full-Page Plates.

ST. ASAPH, HISTORICAL and DESCRIPTIVE. By P. B. IRONSIDE BAX. With an Introduction by the Rev. H. A. JAMES, D.D., Head Master of Rugby, Chaplain of the Lord Bishop, and sometime Dean of the Cathedral.

"A neat little cloth bound volume, in which the author and compiler has brought together in compendious form almost every fact that seems worth preserving in connexion with 'our smallest cathedral.' The book is a capital souvenir of the historic edifice."—Chester Courant.

NEW VOLUME OF FAIRY TALES.

In crown 8vo. cloth, price 6*s.* illustrated.

PRINCES THREE and

SEEKERS SEVEN. Four Fairy Tales by MARY COLQUHOUN. Illustrated by Emily Barnard.

"There are enchantment and delight in these simply told tales for little readers. Miss Colquhoun knows the precise measure of the comprehension of those for whom she writes, and she does not overtax it. The illustrations, by Emily Barnard, are pretty drawings."—Pall Mall Gazette.

"Full of incident, marvellous and otherwise.....Will be eagerly read."—Daily News.

"Four capital fairy stories, which might be read with pleasure by people of any age."—Standard.

NEW NOVELS.

In crown 8vo. cloth, lettered, price 5*s.*

SKETCHES. By ALEXANDER L. KIELLAND. Translated by ROBERT L. CASSIE.

"It is no little achievement to have rendered the masterly prose of Kielland in terse and idiomatic English as Mr. R. L. Cassie has done. All the subtle touches that elude the ordinary translator get new life."—London Scot.

In crown 8vo. cloth, price 6*s.*

A MIXED WORLD. A Novel.

By ADOLPHUS POHL, Author of 'Thomas Brown's Will.'

"The story is a good one, but the chief charm is in the splendid little character studies with which it abounds, and the smart way in which the writer presents the truest social difficulties."—Western Daily Mercury.

In crown 8vo. cloth, price 3*s.* 6*d.*

LIFE. By DAVID HOBBS.

"What has been called the 'literature of locality' receive a pleasing addition in 'Tales of Black Country Life,' by David Hobbs. These tales may be commended as an interesting presentation of the working class among our Scottish ironfields."—Dundee Advertiser.

POEMS. By Samuel Waddington. Fcap 8vo. 4*s.*

"Mr Samuel Waddington's poems are the work of a writer who is already known by one or two volumes of agreeable sonnets."—Times

"A small book of real poetry. Each poem has a charm of its own."—Liverpool Mercury

"If we measure Mr Waddington's worth by the bulk of his work we shall say he is a minor poet. But if we happen to dip into his work we shall joy as did Keats on coming across Chapman's Homer. Mr Waddington has yet but a small public, although he has written sonnets amongst the best of the century."—New Age

"In all the work the craftsmanship is accomplished and sure in a calm, classical manner, cool it may be, but always touched with dignity and elevation of feeling."—Scotsman

"MASTERLY."

PIONEERS OF EVOLUTION.

From Thales to Huxley.

By EDWARD CLODD,
Author of 'The Story of Creation,' &c.

Illustrated with Portraits in Photogravure of Charles Darwin, Prof. Huxley, Mr. Alfred Russel Wallace, and Mr. Herbert Spencer.

DAILY CHRONICLE.—"Masterly.....Mr. Clodd's book furnishes an important contribution to a liberal education."

SCOTSMAN.—"Cannot but prove welcome to fair-minded men.....To read it is to have an object lesson in the meaning of evolution. It sets forth with astonishing brevity, precision, and force the history of the uncompromising opposition offered by the Churches of the Middle Ages to the promulgation, even in whispers, of scientific doctrine..... There is no better book on the subject for the general reader.....No one could go through the book without being both refreshed and newly instructed by its masterly survey of the growth of the most powerful idea of modern times."

ACADEMY.—"Mr. Clodd's is probably the first attempt that has been made to estimate Huxley among his peers. It has succeeded excellently..... Altogether the book could hardly be better done. It is luminous, lucid, orderly, and temperate."

Crown 8vo. cloth, 5*s.* net.

THE FIRST TWO VOLUMES OF

MR. GRANT ALLEN'S HISTORICAL GUIDES.

PARIS and FLORENCE.

"I desire to supply the tourist who wishes to use his travels as a means of culture with such historical and antiquarian information as will enable him to understand, and therefore to enjoy, the architecture, sculpture, painting, and minor arts of the towns he visits."

Extract from the Introduction.

TIMES.—"Good work in the way of showing students the right manner of approaching the history of a great city."

DAILY NEWS.—"They do not in any way compete with 'Murray' or 'Baedeker,' but will be found useful supplements to them.....The idea seems to us a good one, and these guide-books will be found very helpful and suggestive by all leisurely and painstaking travellers."

SCOTSMAN.—"Those who travel for the sake of culture will be well catered for in Mr. Grant Allen's new series."

Mr. L. F. Austin in the SKETCH.—"His 'Paris' is certainly an admirable example of what a purely æsthetic handbook should be, for it is clearly arranged, and written with that ease and intimacy which are born of sympathy and knowledge."

Travels in West Africa: Congo Français, Corisco, and Cameroons. By Mary H. Kingsley. (Macmillan & Co.)

Lady travellers and explorers are by no means rare nowadays, but few have done such good work or written so interesting and attractive an account of it, coupled with so much solid scientific matter, new to a great extent, as Miss Kingsley. She is undoubtedly the first of her sex who has dared to face the manifold dangers of the pestilential regions of the French Congo and other parts of barbarous Western Equatorial Africa; for missionary women and the wives of officials and traders seldom go far from their comfortable homes or run any unnecessary or abnormal risks, and certainly never went canoeing for pleasure or in the interests of science. Indeed, scarcely any other lady would be capable of doing what Miss Kingsley has accomplished and relates in so jaunty a style.

Yet Miss Kingsley—humorous and even comical as her method often is—must undoubtedly be taken seriously, for she displayed keen powers of observation, far keener than those of most men who visit the coast, even the special correspondents of enterprising journals, who have between them written a good deal of nonsense and made many misleading statements, even so recently as during the last Ashanti expedition; on the other hand, we rarely catch Miss Kingsley tripping. Moreover, she has the courage of her opinions, and spares neither Government officials nor missionaries when she thinks they merit censure, whilst she does not hesitate to bestow a due meed of praise on the often abused trader. In fact, she only does justice to this last class when she speaks of their hospitality, kindliness, and trustworthiness.

Miss Kingsley is practically, but not entirely right in terming the West Coast of Africa a "Belle Dame sans merci." A considerable number of Europeans have braved and weathered the really detestable climate for many years, and this proves that it is not quite so fatal as it is said to be; and much of its deadliness is attributable to negligence, imprudence, fear, indolence, or want of sufficient employment for body or mind, for, as she most truly says, "Inactivity in Africa is death." We do not include intemperance as one of the chief causes of mortality, because its prevalence is exaggerated. It is not to be denied that it was far more prevalent sixty or seventy years ago than it is now; but the stimulants then available were of very inferior quality, and many of the residents of those days who imbibed them were men of altogether a lower type than the officials or traders of the present day; as for missionaries, there were very few of them half a century ago.

The extreme unhealthiness of the Gold Coast is in a great measure due to the bad water supply; this is especially the case at Accra, where the thousands of pounds expended in the construction of a cathedral, which might have been postponed for two or three years, would have been far more usefully employed in providing a good and sufficient supply of water, by which the colony would have been an immediate gainer. On the other hand, the bad character given by Miss Kingsley to Fernando Po water can apply to some only of the brooks and streams, as water of excellent quality is obtainable from a spring on the beach at Clarence Cove below high-water mark, where ships fill their tanks and casks. The beauty of Fernando Po is indisputable, and it was justly called Ilha Hermosa by its Portuguese discoverers.

Writing of the dangers of the West Coast, Miss Kingsley correctly remarks:—

"I should like here to speak of West Coast dangers, because I fear you may think that I am careless of, or do not believe in them, neither of which is the case. The more you know of the West Coast of Africa, the more you realise its dangers. For example, on your first voyage out you hardly believe the stories of fever told by the old Coasters. That is because you do not then understand the type of man who is telling them, a man who goes to his death with a joke in his teeth. But a short experience of your own, particularly if you happen on a place having one of its periodic epidemics, soon demonstrates that the underlying horror of the thing is there, a rotting corpse which the old Coaster has dusted over with jokes to cover it, so that it hardly shows at a distance, but which, when you come yourself to live alongside, you soon become cognisant of. Many men, when they have got ashore and settled, realise this, and let the horror get a grip on them; a state briefly and locally described as funk; and a state that generally ends fatally, and you can hardly blame them."

She tells a terrible tale of a young man, new to the coast, who on landing met none but naked savages, as he deemed them, who could not understand him and whom he could not understand; and who, on walking up to the factory, found the agent under whom he came to serve dead and half eaten by rats! This is not an every-day occurrence, it is true, but it is one which might easily happen at some of the more isolated and out-of-the-way spots where trade is carried on by one house only.

When Miss Kingsley speaks of Sierra Leone we presume she means the city of Freetown as distinguished from the adjacent villages. We are quite at one with her in thinking that the Mohammedans "are the gentlemen of the Sierra Leone native population," in which latter class we do not include educated lawyers, doctors, merchants, or subordinate officials; and we do not agree with Bishop Ingham's remark, quoted at p. 18, that "he is disposed to believe that the words of the Koran are only a fetish and a charm to the rank and file" of native Mohammedans, for Miss Kingsley is right in remarking "that it is difficult to understand how the bishop can see a difference between the use of the Koran and the Bible by the negro of Sierra Leone," and that, "judged by every-day conduct, the Mohammedan is in nine cases out of ten the best man in Africa."

There is very much that is both amusing and interesting in the description of Freetown and its inhabitants, but we must pass on to other parts of the coast, merely endorsing the writer's remarks as to the prevalence of poisoning; but we must add that it is quite as frequent on the Gold Coast, especially in the larger towns, such as Accra, Cape Coast, &c. The evil practice is not so frequent further eastward, although by no means non-existent; it prevails, if not alarmingly, yet to a certain extent, in the Congo Français, especially among the Fjât tribes, and it is said to be common at San Paolo de Loanda and in Angola generally.

Miss Kingsley's strictures on missionary work, which are to be read in many parts of the book, are well founded. Until recently technical instruction was completely ignored and neglected in all but the Roman Catholic and Bâle missions, and even now the technical education at some of the mission stations is not what it should be:—

"In some of these technical schools the sort of instruction given is, to my way of thinking, ill-advised; arts of no immediate and great use in the present culture-condition of West Africa—such as printing, book-binding, and tailoring—being taught. But this is not the case under the Wesleyans, who also teach smiths' work, brick-laying, waggon-building, &c. Alas! none of the missions save the Roman Catholic teach the thing that it is most important the natives should learn, in the face of the conditions that European government of the Coast has induced, namely, improved methods of agriculture, and plantation work."

Elsewhere Miss Kingsley has expressed her opinion that to teach native girls dressmaking is "rather previous," seeing that, when married, neither they nor their husbands wear any clothes to speak of; but even the use of the needle is an advance on the system pursued until quite recently by English and American missionaries, which consisted in teaching the three R's (very imperfectly) and the singing of hymns—excellent things in themselves, but not calculated to be of much practical assistance to the pupils in the way of earning daily bread. For many years, on the other hand, the French fathers at the Gaboon and elsewhere have taught gardening, carpentering, bricklaying, &c., to which they have since added instruction in the cultivation of coffee, cocoa, &c. Twenty-five years ago Père Duprat, the treasurer at the Gaboon mission, found time to organize a very good band of some twenty performers, selected from amongst the school children.

There is much reason in what Miss Kingsley says:—

"Nothing strikes me so much, in studying the degeneration of these native tribes, as the direct effect that civilisation and reformation has in hastening it. The worst enemy to the African tribe is the one who comes to it and says: 'Now you must civilise and come to school, and leave off all those awful goings on of yours, and settle down quietly.' The tribe does so; the African is teachable and tractable; and then the ladies and some of the young men are happy and content with the excitement of European clothes and frequent Church services; but the older men and some of the bolder young men soon get bored with these things and the, to them, irksome restraints, and they go in for too much rum, or mope themselves to death, or return to their native customs. The African treats his religion much as other men do; when he gets slightly educated, a little scientific, one might say, he removes from his religion all the disagreeable parts. He promptly eliminates its equivalent Hell, represented in Fetishism by immediate and not future retribution. Then goes his rigid Sabbath-keeping and food-restriction equivalent, and he has nothing left but the agreeable portions: dances, polygamy, and so on; and it 's a very bad thing for him. I only state these things so as to urge upon people at home the importance of combining technical instruction in their mission teaching; which by instilling into the African mind ideas of discipline, and providing him with manual occupation, will save him from these relapses, which are now the reproach of missionary effort, and the curse and degradation of the African."

Miss Kingsley more than once insists that Africans "have never made a single fourteenth-rate piece of cloth, pottery, a tool or machine, house," &c.; but she is wrong—good cloths are made in the hinterland of Sierra Leone and Liberia, also in the Gold Coast, Ashanti, Dahomey, Lagos, &c.; the Ashantis work silk fairly well; moreover, in Appendix V., Miss Kingsley herself tells the story of the invention of the cloth loom, which is found in many parts of Africa, and is, undoubtedly, an independent invention by Africans. Some of the tools are not to be despised, and many of their weapons are excellently made; the cross-bow of the Ba-Fanh is ingenious; their pottery certainly leaves something to be desired, but it varies in quality in different localities.

The Bubis are peculiar in many of their habits and customs; that they came from Mpongweland is extremely doubtful, and King Passall of Malimba, an intelligent man, states that the Bubis came from the hinterland of Malimba. Their grand headcovering, adorned with the tail feathers of chanticleer, which Miss Kingsley describes, is known as the "kokoroko" hat. By the way, Miss Kingsley seems to be in error in saying that the Bubis, like the Fans, occasionally pull out their eyebrows — surely she means eyelashes. This is, or used to be, a very common practice, not only among the Fans (Ba-Fanh), but also among other tribes.

The Mpongwe, an interesting, but rapidly diminishing tribe inhabiting the shores of the estuary of the Gaboon, are only usurpers of that name, and probably have not been in their present abode much more than a hundred years. They are, and have been for the last fifty years, a timid, not to say cowardly race, whereas their predecessors, the real Mpongwe nation mentioned by Barbot and other old writers, who called them Pongos, were powerful and warlike, and went in their canoes as far as the Cameroon river to chastise the people then living there, who had in some way given them offence.

In chap. vi. Miss Kingsley describes Libreville (the Freetown of the Gaboon) and Glass, and tells us "why she went to Congo Français," and here she introduces her readers to the Ogowé, "the greatest truly equatorial river in the world," which the British public, there is no manner of doubt, first heard of from Du Chaillu, although rumours of its existence reached Bowdich early in the present century. Miss Kingsley errs, however, in stating that the Ogowé has been in the possession of France nearly forty years, as the first cession of territory near the confluence of the Okanda and Ngunié was made by the Inlenga chiefs to Lieut. Aymès in the Pionnier in May, 1867. The Lower Fernan Vaz and the Kama country were ceded to the same officer in 1868, and also some portion of the Lower Ogowé, near Ngumbi; whilst the treaty in virtue of which France acquired the entire Igalwa territory was made between Admiral du Quilio and the chief Nkombé in August, 1873.

The estuary of the Gaboon was acquired by France in 1843, and about the same time it was ascertained by Consul Beecroft, who ascended the Nkâmâ, its principal affluent, in the steamer Éthiope, that it was of no value as a highway into the interior. The attention of the French Government was first called to the Gaboon, as Miss Kingsley states, through the visit of the Prince de Joinville in the Belle Poule, and Capt. Monléon was shortly afterwards dispatched with a small squadron to secure it for France; but for many years his countrymen troubled themselves very little about it, treating it simply as an annexe of their settlement on the Côte d'Or. It remained practically unexplored and undeveloped until 1875, and more than once before that date the Gaboon, together with Grand Bassam, Dabou, and Assini, was offered to England in exchange for the Gambia, and in that case England might have acquired, had she wished, not only what is now the Congo Français, but also the Ivory Coast, the Côte d'Or, Whydah and Dahomey, as the French Government were willing to undertake to make no acquisitions of territory south of the river Casamance.

The discovery of Ogolole (Ogâlolé) is by no means recent, as Miss Kingsley supposes; it has long been known and utilized by the natives, and also by Europeans since the establishment of factories for legitimate trade in the Fernan Vaz, and many years before that by Spanish and Portuguese slave-traders, whose headquarters were at Sengatanga (Osenga-w'atanga). Miss Kingsley is also mistaken in stating that the American missionaries have been in Gaboon for only thirty years, as they really settled at Glass in 1842, coming from Cape Palmas, where they had been established for some few years previously.

The most thrilling portions of Miss Kingsley's personal narrative are undoubtedly her accounts of her ascent of "The Rapids of the Ogowé," and of her march from Lake Ncovi (? Nkove) to Esoon (Esun), and from Esoon to Agonjo. It is in these chapters that she shows her indifference to danger, hardships, and privations, and her enjoyment of what she terms "athletic sports"—jumps, falls, tumbles, and unpremeditated baths. She does not exactly say how far she went up these rapids, but as she saw Kondo-Kondo (Okândâ-Kândâ) and the Alemba, she could form a fair idea of what the Ogowé rapids are like. We fear that her desire to see the river on her next visit in the rainy season will not be gratified so far as the rapids are concerned, for no canoe could possibly struggle against them at that period of the year.

A peculiarity of the Ogowé is not only its very intricate delta, but also the large number of small lakes or lagoons which communicate with it along the greater part of its course below Adéké Island and the rapids, many of which were known to the Portuguese and other early travellers, and have been rediscovered during the last thirty years. The seasons are not precisely as stated by Miss Kingsley. The long wet season commences about mid-September, but there is a break, called the middle dries, in December and January, sometimes running into February; the rains recommence in the latter month, and continue till mid-May, when the long dry season begins.

Our author excels in description of forest and river scenery, both in their diurnal and nocturnal aspects. Her midnight bath in the lake is told in her most amusing, not to say comical style, but we do not envy her her supper on the flesh of the horned cerastes, probably the most deadly snake in West Africa. We may quote her account of the discovery of human flesh in the room where she was trying to sleep:—

"Waking up again, I noticed that the smell in the room was violent, from being shut up, I suppose, and it had an undoubted organic origin. Knocking the ash off the smouldering bush-light that lay burning on the floor, I investigated and tracked it to those bags, so I took down the biggest one, and carefully noted how the tie-tie had been put round its mouth, for these things are important and often mean a lot. I then shook the contents into my hat, for fear of losing anything of value. They were a human hand, three big toes, four eyes, two ears, and other portions of the human frame. The hand was fresh, the others only so so, and shrivelled. Replacing them, I tied the bag up, and hung it up again. I subsequently learnt that although the Fans will eat their fellow friendly tribesfolk, yet they like to keep a little something belonging to them as a memento. This touching trait in their character I learnt from Wiki; and though it 's to their credit under the circumstances, still it 's an unpleasant practice when they hang the remains in the bedroom you occupy, particularly if the bereavement in your host's family has been recent."

Among the relics of departed kindred and ancestors mentioned at the foot of p. 444 as being preserved by natives are skulls, and especially the lower jaws, which seem to have an especial value in the estimation of Negro and Bantu tribes alike. They are used both in Ashanti and Dahomey as ornaments for war-drums; they are also preserved in the entire collection of ancestral relics held by the head of the family among the Nkâmi tribes, which is known as elâmbâ z'abambo. Du Chaillu, in his 'Journey to Ashangoland,' speaks of alumbi as a custom; but the word only signifies relics, some of the tribes calling the small hut in which these are kept nago-abambo, others nago-alumbi. What special virtue resides in the lower jaw it is hard to say, but having collected a large number of African skulls, we found it often very difficult to procure complete ones in this respect.

The natives of West Africa generally believe that power is acquired over others by possession of their hair, nails, &c., and there is an abominable practice in some parts of mixing certain things in the food of a person over whom it is desired to obtain influence; some of these preparations are in the nature of love philtres, others are employed to secure the favour of a white man in the way of trade, &c. Ombwiri (pl. Imbwiri) is a name given to spirits of various kinds, who are supposed to inhabit all sorts of strange places, especially abnormally formed rocks, small islands, peculiar trees, &c.; and every natural phenomenon, such as an echo, a whirlpool, a cave, &c., is supposed to be the work of an ombwiri; sometimes there are two, male and female.

The voyage down the Rembwe to Glass was not altogether an unmixed pleasure nor devoid of excitement, especially the chase of Obanji's (or Capt. Johnson's) canoe by the Ba-Fanh. Obanji is a type, and is exceedingly well portrayed by the author, whilst her encounter with the polished and polite "Prince" Makaga is entertaining; but we have a suspicion that Makaga must have given himself brevet rank, for, unless we are mistaken, some twenty-five years ago he was a cook. Princes, however, are plentiful in West Africa, and soi-disant creations are not altogether unknown in London and Liverpool.

Miss Kingsley's remarks on the Congo Français are well justified. She says: "My reason for going into these geographical details at all is that I think no region in Africa of equal importance is so little known in England." This is absolutely true; but she falls into some errors, which is not surprising, seeing that the records of Ogowé exploration are exceedingly incomplete, those that exist being scattered among many reports, and difficult of access; and it is astonishing that Miss Kingsley should have gleaned so much information about the district. The printers have helped to bewilder the reader, and have made a sad mess of native names in the foot-notes.

Miss Kingsley is mistaken in believing that what Du Chaillu calls a tomahawk, and others a throwing-knife, is a sacrificial knife. The sacrificial or beheading knife of the Ba-Fanh, which it is now impossible to procure, is heavy at what should be the pointed end, where it is 5 in. or 6 in. broad or even more, the entire weapon being quite 2 ft. long, broadening out from the haft; in the hands of an expert and powerful man it would easily cut through a human neck at a single blow. Specimens can probably be seen at the United Service Museum, and in the collection of General Pitt-Rivers, which was exhibited at Bethnal Green.

Death by witchcraft is almost universally believed in by Negro and Bantu tribes. Death from natural causes is not supposed to be possible. Even death in fight or by accident is considered to be caused by the malevolent influence of some personal enemy aided by a spirit or spirits. Miss Kingsley thus explains the native ideas as to death and as to procuring it by the aid of malignant spirits:—

"From this method of viewing nature I feel sure that the general idea arose, which you find in all early cultures, that death was always the consequence of the action of some malignant spirit, and that there is no accidental or natural death, as we call it; and death is, after all, the most important attribute of life. If a man were knocked on the head with a club or shot with an arrow, the cause of death is clearly the malignancy of the person using those weapons; and so it is easy to think that a man killed by a fallen tree, or by the upsetting of a canoe in the surf or in an eddy in the river, is also the victim of some being using them as weapons. A man having thus gained a belief that there are more than human actors in life's tragedy, the idea that disease is also a manifestation of some invisible being's wrath and power seems to me natural and easy; and he knows you can get another man for a consideration to kill or harm a third party, and so he thinks that, for a consideration, you can also get one of those superhuman beings, which we call gods or devils, but which the African regards in another light, to do so."

The belief in reincarnation is held in many parts; in some it is imagined that a person will return to this world in human form; in others, in the shape of some animal; while it is by no means an uncommon idea among the natives on the Ogowé that the souls of the dead enter certain large butterflies. Post-mortem examinations in cases of suspected witchcraft are not unusual, so that it frequently happens that the symptoms of some internal disease are considered satisfactory proof that the subject is possessed by a "witch," and it is often said of a person who is too clever or too prosperous, "Are nyemba," "He has a witch."

Among the Fjort (Fjât) tribes at Loango, Kabinda, &c., the corpses of relatives are kept for months before burial, being wrapped in cloth (not clothes) provided by sons, brothers, fathers, &c., as the case may be, until they attain an enormous size; the bigger the bundle, the greater the piety and affection of the survivors. If one remarks on the shabbiness of a man's attire, it is common to be told in reply, "I never bury my father yet," meaning that all the cloth he earns is devoted to the envelopment of his father's corpse.

Among the Mpongwe widows must shave their heads, and are only allowed to wear a single fathom of black or dark blue cloth. They are appropriated by the near surviving relatives, according to circumstances. The lot of widows for some weeks after their husbands' death, "taking one consideration with another, is not a happy one." They are flogged and maltreated in every way, and are always the first to be accused of causing their husbands' death by witchcraft or poison.

Whilst adultery is severely punished among many tribes, by others it is deemed quite a venial offence, and is easily condoned, especially if the injured husband makes a good profit by it. Among the Mpongwe-speaking tribes it is often used as a means of levying blackmail. The husband and wife perfectly understand each other, and the former is kept acquainted with all intrigues, and at the right moment surprises his wife and her paramour, and exacts heavy damages from the latter.

We cannot enter fully into the subject of secret societies, but must content ourselves with a few brief remarks. "Yasi" is not a society, but the oath of the Igalwa Isyoga, which has only recently been introduced at Gaboon; the sign is drawing the open right hand down the left arm from shoulder to wrist. This sign is also that of the secret society of the Apinji, Okanda, and other tribes. In the Gaboon there is a society for men called Indâ, and one for women called Njembé, which among other tribes is changed to Nyembé. There is also another association styled Mwetye, which is the most secret of all, and concerns itself with the sacrifices to the manes of dead men, and the execution of what may be called secret death-warrants, to which we nearly fell a victim in 1869. Ventriloquism is employed by some of the members of these societies.

We by no means share Miss Kingsley's opinion of the unhealthiness of the Gaboon, but a distinction must be made between Libreville and Glass, quite independent of climatic considerations. The English and German traders at Glass, as well as the American missionaries, enjoy fairly good health, the mortality amongst them never being abnormally heavy. This is because the mode of life adopted by the English and Germans is different from that of French residents, and more conducive to the preservation of health; while one of the chief causes of mortality among the French is that the extensive coal depôt is situated on the beach directly to windward of the Plateau, the residence of the officials.

Miss Kingsley has been well advised in relegating to appendices such subjects as "Trade and Labour" and "Disease in West Africa," as well as Dr. Günther's "Report on Reptiles and Fishes" and Mr. Kirby's "List of Orthoptera," as they would interfere with the narrative, and are not of interest to the general reader. Of the excellence of the first two, and of the insight gained by Miss Kingsley into the subject of both, it is impossible to speak too highly; although they are neither complete nor exhaustive, they prove that the author has devoted much time to gaining information, and is a keen and accurate observer. She believes that there is no prospect of immediate dividends from railways, and censures the apathy of the English compared with the energy displayed by our French and German rivals; and she complains of the great difficulty of obtaining trade statistics, and of the carelessness and dilatoriness of English officials in preparing them. "I confess," she remarks,

"I am not an enthusiast in civilising the African. My idea is that the French method of dealing with Africa is the best at present. Get as much of the continent as possible down in the map as yours, make your flag wherever you go a sacred thing to the native—a thing he dare not attack. Then, when you have done this, you may abandon the French plan and gradually develope the trade in an English manner, but not in the English manner à la Sierra Leone. But do your pioneer work first. There is a very excellent substratum for English pioneer work on our coasts in the trading community, for trade is the great key to the African's heart, and everywhere the English trader and his goods stand high in West African esteem."

The Labour question is a difficult one and so is the Drink question, and neither of them, especially the latter, is understood in England. They are far too intricate to be dealt with fully and properly here. The Drink question is not so great an evil as many missionaries represent. That the traffic needs regulating is indisputable, but so far the attempts to regulate it have not been successful because the question is not understood by officials either at home or on the spot.

The illustrations are good, but we must express our regret that there is no map. For all who know West Equatorial Africa Miss Kingsley's book will possess an absorbing interest, whilst those who have not yet visited that country will gain a vast amount of varied and useful information on many subjects. Long as this notice is, it is not so exhaustive as we could wish, but it is pleasant to find so much in this admirable book to praise and commend and so little to disagree with.

Memoir of John Veitch, LL.D., Professor of Logic and Rhetoric, University of Glasgow. By Mary R. L. Bryce. (Blackwood & Sons.)

Border Essays. By John Veitch. (Same publishers.)

John Veitch evidently inherited his Border spirit and love of nature. His father, Sergeant James Veitch, of Peebles, an old soldier full of tales of service under Wellington and proud of his Peninsular medal, was an angler so keen as to have earned the name of "Veitch the Fisher." The son, born in 1829, a studious boy, with an affinity for the romantic and superstitious, seeking pastime only with his fishing-rod, left the grammar school of Peebles in 1845 for Edinburgh University, designed for the Free Church, then in the first flush of its foundation. Falling under the spell of Sir William Hamilton, Veitch felt so drawn to philosophy that theology sank, to use his own figure, "44° below zero." He thought there was some rubbish requiring a clearance in Calvinism. He came out as gold medalist in moral philosophy. In 1850 he lapsed into a brief enthusiasm for Shelley, although in the midst of translating Descartes, a task which lasted until 1853. By that time he had thrown overboard all idea of the Church as his future, albeit his reaction against Calvin had never carried him far into scepticism. After some service as a professorial and editorial assistant he was chosen Professor of Logic at St. Andrews in 1860. Two years later he was transferred to a corresponding position in Glasgow, during his occupancy of which his best-known works in literary history, philosophy, and poetry appeared.

Whether these facts validly called for a biography may well be questioned. All that the professor had to say had been said in his books and essays. His biographer prints no fragment of autobiography nor letter of the smallest moment. The contrast with his erewhile rival, Prof. Nichol, is not more marked in their fortunes after death than during life. Veitch did not sketch his life with a premature eye to posterity as Nichol did. Seemingly, he let posterity shift for itself; we hear of no diary, and one suspects that his biographer, unlike Nichol's, was short of really good material. His few acquaintanceships with men of mark can scarcely ever have reached intimacy. At least, his letter-box to all seeming preserved practically nothing of the familiar wit and wisdom of his friends. The biography could not scintillate with his own epigrams, for he made none: even a bright phrase is rare. Under these circumstances the biographer had largely to depend on herself. Nothing but an intelligent presentment of the man as a whole — measuring him, despite his own canon, less by what he became than by what he accomplished—could have justified the attempt even of an affectionate relative under a pious sense of obligation and under cover of writing for his friends. To begin with, there is something radically astray in a scheme which devotes 116 pages to the schoolboy and student, and only the remaining 81 to what are called "after-days" — that absurd designation being applied to the years from 1860 onwards and all the activities they embraced, that is to say, to the man and his life-work. And out of these 81 pages, eight go to testimonials and congratulations over the St. Andrews appointment, culminating in a dinner by the magistrates of Peebles! The world at large could have lived on without the detailed information that the professor's gift of prayer greatly impressed the class-room. It would have preferred to read some account of his philosophic evolution. What would he have thought had his vision of the future shown him his life written without an attempt to define his vital contribution to philosophy, and with a calm and as it were official admission that he had no solid constructive power? It would have been refreshing to have an equally candid valuation of his merits in literature and history, or an attempt to fix the percentage of mere rhetoric in both his prose and verse.

The volume of 'Border Essays'—in a sense a by-product, a posthumous reprint of fugitive magazine articles—hardly affords a fair criterion of Veitch's quality, historical, critical, and literary. Though composed of detached minor pieces, its note is clear even to resonance that the author was an out-of-doors man with an intense passion for natural scenery and with a descriptive touch, apt to be a little heavy at times, but spontaneous and true. Wordsworthian in every fibre, his heart leaped up to behold, not the rainbow in the sky, but the sky itself. This, as in his life and in all he wrote, is palpable in the 'Border Essays.' Historically and critically, however, the result is thin. The real personage, David Ritchie, who sat as model for Scott's 'Black Dwarf,' seems rather a petty theme for a professor, although sympathetically and interestingly handled. 'A Day's Raid into Northumberland' has little beyond guide-book learning to recommend its discussion of the legends of the Sewingshields Crags, an old spelling of which, by the way—Sywinescheles—might have helped towards a new etymology. Under the title of 'Mr. Gladstone's Ancestors,' the story of the Scottish family of Gledstanes is told with the assistance of the Burgh Records Society's 'Charters of Peebles.' Had the writer familiarly known Scottish chronicle, he might have produced a different rendering of the siege of Cocklaw by the Percies in 1403. Had he been antiquary enough to study the printed records of Scotland, he would never have missed the journey of William of Gledstanes, junior, into England, "causâ studendi et actus scolasticos exercendi in universitate Oxon' sive Cantabrig'," in 1358. A paper dealing with the Yarrow poems of Wordsworth and Scott shows him on a theme more closely allied to his bent of mind than early family history. It is a connecting narrative and exegetic commentary. It quotes extensively, and, in spite of some high-coloured gilding, is natural and direct, and may be instructive to those not already familiar with these masterpieces of the century.

Generally speaking, as historian the professor came far too easily by his facts. His dominating instincts, those of rhetorician and poet, lay in an opposite direction from the searching out and balancing of evidence. Indeed, he probably never really got near the bottom of the ultimate authorities in any of the historic questions he touched. Hence his critical and other opinions, if dependent — as they so often were — on conclusions in history, require narrow scrutiny, for there as elsewhere the superstructure rests only upon the base. When he comes to be considered on his own special ground as critic of and commentator on Border poetry, the qualification just hinted at will without doubt materially affect his final position.

We revert to the biography to say that it should have furnished a bibliography. It does not so much as contain a list of the professor's books. One can understand its reticence about the joke of a colleague on the publication of 'The Tweed, and other Poems,' that the author ought to have been prosecuted under the Pollution of Rivers Act! But it may be regretted that there is no general critical estimate of his achievement in philosophy and place in literature. It is thus unfortunate that a life of note should have been made somewhat disappointing. To his fervour of "spiritual intuition," as Mr. Wenley called it, Veitch owed his eloquence and his inspiring influence over younger men. It permeated his private life also, and his niece has not failed to do justice to the entire attractiveness and worth of his personal side.

C. Suetoni Tranquilli Divus Augustus. Edited by Evelyn S. Shuckburgh, M.A. (Cambridge, University Press.)

We hail with pleasure this volume, the fruit of the first serious endeavour yet made to supply English readers with an illustrative commentary upon any portion of Suetonius. In it are set forth in a lucid and well-ordered fashion the main results of modern research concerning the mightiest political transformation which history has yet had to record. Mr. Shuckburgh has executed in a manner deserving of praise the plan announced by him in his preface "to illustrate the work of Suetonius by putting before the reader, as fully as space would permit, the materials which exist for constructing the history of the life and times of Augustus, and which expand and explain the necessarily brief and summarized statements in the Biography itself." Many of the notes are as clear and admirable presentments of the subject-matter with which they deal as one could wish to see. Nor is the work by any means a mere compilation. At many points Mr. Shuckburgh has shown himself capable of exercising to good purpose an independent judgment. We do not wish to complain of the editor because he has not forestalled the coming German or French scholar who will treat the subject in exhaustive and overloaded volumes. Yet, considering the smallness of the demand which exists in England for editions of the minor Latin classics, and the little likelihood there is that either Mr. Shuckburgh or any other English scholar will, before any long time has elapsed, go over the ground again, we cannot help regretting that a somewhat different scheme was not adopted. Much of the information contained in the notes is now to be found in works generally accessible, to which the reader might in many cases have been referred. The space thus gained would have enabled the editor to secure for the edition greater completeness and usefulness. As it stands, it supplies much illustrative material which lies out of the ordinary student's reach, but by an extended use of the ancient sources and of the modern literature bearing upon the early Empire a good deal more might have been gleaned. The list of modern authorities given in the introduction is strikingly defective. While Beulé's popular pamphlet is included, the names of H. Schiller and V. Gardthausen (to say nothing of the writers of numerous articles and monographs) are not to be found there. Another serious defect is the absence of any critical estimate of the historical value of Dio, Appian, and other ancient writers quoted in illustration of the text of Suetonius. And although the edition has been constructed mainly with an historical purpose in view, still one must feel sorry, for the reason already mentioned, that Mr. Shuckburgh did not find it possible to deal in a more thorough fashion with matters affecting the language and text of his author. The broad question of the position which the diction of Suetonius holds in the realm of "silver Latin" is treated in the introduction, but the treatment is restricted and unsatisfactory.

Considering the great compass and intricacy of the materials which the editor had to handle, the number of errors in detail, and of omissions in circumstances where omissions are likely to mislead, is not serious, and will not appreciably detract from the value of the work for students' purposes. The need of further verification will be oftener felt in connexion with the notes on language than with those on history. In some instances where linguistic usages are marked as peculiar the missing parallels are to be found in the dictionaries. Thus Forcellini affords illustrations of the phrase a memoria (p. xxxv); of speculator used for "spy" (p. 59); and of praediximus, meaning "we have previously stated" (p. 158). On p. 80 two quotations from Tacitus are given to illustrate the order of the names in Cordus Cremutius. The limitation of the note may mislead unwary students with regard to a usage which is widespread in Latin, early, classical, and late. The assertion (p. 123) that Cicero would write not "emere ab aliquo," but "emere de aliquo," is incorrect; both constructions of the verb are common in his writings; and attention may be called to one grammatical point concerning which Mr. Shuckburgh repeats what is current in the grammars and dictionaries of the day. In a note on p. 80 he states that, with regard to fungi, "the later writers imitated the construction of the prae-Ciceronians" by putting the object in the accusative. But, among authors down to the end of the first century A.D., the only alleged examples are one in Nepos, two in Tacitus, and three in Suetonius, all in the life of Augustus (cc. 35, 36, 45). If these authors departed in these few instances from the accustomed construction of fungi, which they generally followed, they were guilty of a strange freak. With regard to Suetonius, the example from c. 45 is not in point, "suam vicem" being an adverbial phrase. In c. 36 the reading quaesturam is not certain on the evidence of the MSS., and is rendered still more uncertain by the fact that the word is preceded by two other words ending in -am. In the third passage (c. 35) "senatorio munere" is probably the right reading, the word senatorio having been accidentally assimilated in its ending to molestia, which goes before; this entailed the change of munere to munera. The two quotations from Tacitus are for similar reasons suspicious; and the evidence for the original text of Nepos is notoriously unsatisfactory.

A few points (out of many) connected more with subject-matter than with language may be noticed. In c. 4 the words "e pago Thurino" may well mean "belonging to one of the pagi in the district of Thurii." But possibly e pago is an error of the MSS. for ex agro. The militaria dona bestowed on the young Octavius by Caesar at his triumph in 46 can hardly have been "the dress and ornaments of a commander" (note on c. 8). They rather consisted in the 20,000 sesterces which each soldier received (Dio, 43, 21) and torques, armillae, phalerae, and such like trappings. The expression κοσμοῖς στρατηγικοῖς in the passage from Nicolas of Damascus adduced by Mr. Shuckburgh does not mean more than ornamentis militaribus. The date given on p. 28 for the surrender of Perusia, viz., March, 40, is too late; the end of January or beginning of February is more probable. In the discussion of the alleged sacrifice of prisoners by Augustus at the arae Perusinae reference should have been made to the testimony of Appian and Velleius. With regard to the battle of Naulochus and the surrender of the legions which had been under the command of Lepidus (c. 16), Mommsen has clearly shown (in Hermes, vol. xvii.) that the former event took place near the end of August, 36, and the latter on September 3rd of that year. On p. 53 there is a curiously precise statement about a very dubious matter, viz., that "since B.C. 80 a term of military service had ceased to be a condition for obtaining office." The doubts of Mommsen and others as to the possibility of maintaining the reading "priore vexillo" in c. 25 should scarcely have been passed by; and sundry similar matters have not been noticed. In speaking of the arrangements made by Tiberius for the appointment of magistrates it would have been well to refer to the separate treatment of the consulship (Tacitus, 'Annals,' i. 81). Three praetorii, not two, were charged with the administration of the aerarium militare, as is stated by Dio in the chapter which Mr. Shuckburgh partly quotes (note on c. 49). The explanation of decuriae in c. 57 as indicating "groups of ten families constituting a tribe" should scarcely have been contemplated as possible, and the comparison of decuriatio tribulium in Cicero is hardly relevant. The date of the foundation of the earliest temple of Apollo at Rome is 432 B.C., not 413. It was surely Catulus and not Cato who dubbed Cicero "pater patriae" or "parens patriae." In the note on c. 94 about the adoption of Capricornus by Augustus as his sign no allusion is made to a probable explanation, viz., that in casting the horoscope of a child not the time of birth, but the time of conception, was taken into account. The volume is admirably and correctly printed.

The Life of Gordon. By Demetrius C. Boulger. With Portrait. 2 vols. (Fisher Unwin.)

Many biographies of Gordon have been published—the best, we think, by Sir Henry Gordon, the elder brother of the hero; but none is final or completely satisfactory—for obvious reasons. The life cannot be written until many persons concerned are dead and till Gordon's papers, hitherto and for some time to come necessarily private, can be publicly and freely used. It is difficult, it must be confessed, to see the necessity for this latest attempt, which calls itself 'The Life of Gordon,' and which, by means of amazingly thick paper, somewhat out of keeping with the rather mean-looking type, fills two volumes, though the two together contain but 350 pages. Mr. Boulger claims that he has presented "a complete view and final verdict," and he is confident that "nothing in the unpublished documents will affect the main conclusions" at which he has arrived concerning the Khartoum mission and its end. He states that for two years he had Gordon's private papers in his custody, but he does not mention whether he copied or made notes of them. At present these documents cannot be published, under the terms of Miss Gordon's will; and the impression of those who have the means of knowing is that they do contain important materials which would probably modify current views. However this may be, there are other persons and other documents concerned in Gordon's work and death, and it is quite certain that in their case publication is at present out of the question. On the whole, then, it seems to us that the new biography cannot be complete or final, and that any attempt at a balanced historical judgment of the facts connected with the fall of Khartoum must for some time be premature.

It would be unjust, however, to ignore many excellent qualities in Mr. Boulger's biography. It is short and to the point, a connected vigorous narrative, and free from that mawkish sentiment which has sometimes been expended upon Gordon, but which Gordon himself would have scorned. Mr. Boulger dwells especially on the old Adam in the General's character, and maintains that "to the end of his life the true Gordon was more of the soldier than the saint." Thanks to this idea, we hear more of the manliness and impetuosity of the soldier than the doings of the philanthropist or the devout musings of the pilgrim; and we are grateful. Besides taking a rational and practical view of the man, Mr. Boulger is well qualified to write upon the historical and political situation, especially in China—a subject which occupies a fourth of the book. He is able to publish a clear and, let us add, dramatic account of what happened at the murder of the Wangs, and to show that Gordon afterwards retracted his censure of Sir Halliday Macartney. Indeed, the two remained friends ever after. This is a useful rectification of a passage which has been widely misrepresented. On the other hand, we are not so sure that Mr. Boulger is right about the cause of Gordon's resignation as private secretary to Lord Ripon. He asserts that the "determining cause" was the Government's treatment of Yakub Khan; but there is high authority for believing that Gordon repented his acceptance of so utterly uncongenial a post almost as soon as he had accepted it, and that he had made up his mind to resign even before he arrived in India. His subsequent visit to China affords his biographer occasion to make the remarkable statement that the German and English ambassadors — Von Brandt and Wade—tried to induce Gordon to take command of Li Hung Chang's forces and march with Li on Peking to depose the emperor and set up a new government. Herr von Brandt and Lady Wade have both publicly denied the truth of this charge; but Mr. Boulger has not yet withdrawn it. Again, when he comes to deal with the Khartoum expedition, the biographer adopts a contentious attitude, which has naturally excited some controversy. The subject is too political for discussion in these pages, but one or two points may be touched upon. It is clear, for example, that Mr. Boulger can know little of the character of Lord Cromer when he accuses him of objecting to Gordon's mission solely on account of jealous irritation caused by an old dispute on Egyptian finances. The usual attack is made on Sir Charles Wilson for his delay at Metemmeh; but we fancy Mr. Boulger has no idea of the exhausted condition of the desert column after the engagements at Abu-Klea and Gubat, or of the way in which it was hampered by the necessary care of the wounded. Had Sir Charles Wilson even arrived in time to find Gordon alive, in a starving city, when the besiegers were on the point of the final assault, it is not easy to see what he could have effected. Sir Charles was not instructed to reinforce Gordon; he was merely to confer with him, and Mr. Boulger says the letter he carried from Lord Wolseley ordered Gordon to resign his command and immediately retire from Khartoum. One can easily imagine Gordon's reply. Another point on which Mr. Boulger dwells with some insistence is the refusal to send Zubayr to the Soudan; but is it certain that Zubayr would have gone, even if permitted? and if he had gone would he or could he have done any good?

Altogether Mr. Boulger has at least succeeded in writing an interesting, highly controversial, and far from final sketch of a most impressive career. As literature, perhaps, it has no great claim to admiration; it is the work of a journalist, and the style is often careless and never distinguished. But it has the qualities of vigour, rapidity of narrative, and personal conviction, and these count for something in the biography of a man of action.

NEW NOVELS.

The Babe, B.A. By E. F. Benson. (Putnam's Sons.)

"Distinctly lifelike and entertaining" must be the verdict on Mr. Benson's latest performance as far as it goes. Although he has wisely not attempted to write a university novel, the set of men and the colleges he deals with in the scenes he has strung together are hardly representative of Cambridge life. He has, at any rate, resisted the temptation to kill, marry, or "send down" any of his characters. Here are no lurid drunkards "giddy and crapulous," such as Dean Farrar gave us, and none of the brilliantly impossible degrees which prevail in other pages. The period seems modern, but confused, as it embraces the vogue of the 'Second Mrs. Tanqueray' and also of the Hôtel Cecil. Among the scenes portrayed, the rehearsal of a Greek play, a Rugby football match, and an idle morning of "work" are all admirable; but we miss some account of the boat-races and rowing proper. Though light in the extreme, the book has needed some application to read. The fact is that the chief Don (there are only two drawn at any length) and the chief undergraduate, the Babe, both talk "Dodo." This clever, irresponsible dialect, irradiated with ingeniously misapplied quotations and easy paradox, fills far too much of the book, and wearies on repetition. To quote the remark which every freshman is sure to hear attributed to a well-known Cambridge character, and even introduce an unkind reference to him by name, seems also quite in the style of the author of 'Dodo,' and in very bad taste. The Don as lecturer is not touched on at all, and the amount of time wasted by the characters, dons and others, in mere talk is excessive. We are much surprised to find the Babe at the end of his three years first in the second class of the History Tripos. He was a good fellow, but his form of fatuity is hardly characteristic of the Cambridge undergraduate. The local colour is undeniably good, and the illustrations give some idea of "the Backs," but the book is carelessly printed.

The Yoke of Steel. By C. J. Wills and Godfrey Burchett. (Hurst & Blackett.)

The reader of Mr. C. J. Wills's fiction is accustomed to look for good literature; and so much of 'The Yoke of Steel' as answers that description will probably be attributed to him. The problem which the writers have in view is that of illustrating a warm-hearted innocent girl's rebellion against her husband's well-meaning but austere tyranny; she becomes entangled by an indiscretion, and husband and would-be lover fight with swords. The book would be better for the absence of this melodramatic and unnecessary scene. It is probably inserted only to give the story a claim to dramatization; and it spoils what would otherwise be a clever novel. The book has most of the elements of popularity, and is well written.

The Sport of the Gods. By Esther Miller. (Innes & Co.)

Where a man is liable to be indicted for murder, and where the only witness who can condemn him, or save him by silence, is a woman, one of two things can happen. She can be called as a witness to give her evidence, or, if there is no disability or impediment, she can marry the accused. In a criminal case a wife's testimony is not admissible against her husband. On this question turns the story entitled 'The Sport of the Gods.' It is long before the heroine knows that her husband is innocent, and until then they live apart. At length it is found that there was another and a better witness, and the real murderer is revealed. Such is the story, and, as a melodramatic plot, it is very well told. The reader will regret that the literary skill of the author, which is small, is not equal to her capacity for framing a plot. Nevertheless the novel is exciting and preserves its interest to the end. We imagine that a lawyer who reads the first few chapters will ask why the leading personages, including a practising solicitor, are not indicted for conspiracy (by statute as well as at common law); but such an occurrence would unquestionably spoil an otherwise excellent story.

The Will that Wins. By Quinton Simmel. (Digby, Long & Co.)

The author of this book thinks that the events recorded in its pages, being founded on fact, should make it "more valuable and interesting to every reader." It is certainly not interesting. Of its value some opinion may be formed from the following brilliant passage:—

"We were completely out of our bias. Somehow things there seemed different from what they really were. Even among the trees there were shrill sounds of wind. Everything around appeared in a mis-maze [sic], and all groaned together."

'The Will that Wins' is a travesty of literature.

An English Wife. By Bertha M. M. Miniken. (Digby, Long & Co.)

Were the attractions of this novel in any way proportionate to its inordinate length, 'An English Wife' would be a work of genius. It might possibly please a schoolgirl were the book shortened by one-half. It is well intentioned, but it is not a successful effort at the composition of fiction. On p. 186 somebody's lines are described as "sonsy." This and some other phrases appear quite meaningless.

L'Orme du Mail. Par Anatole France. (Paris, Calmann Lévy.)

The new novel of M. Anatole France has neither beginning nor end, plot, story, construction, nor any of the ordinary characteristics of a novel. He has not attempted to impart them to his volume, or apparently to finish it. At the same time the book contains an interesting study of ecclesiastical society in the France of the present day, and here and there some representative passages of the pleasant cynicism of the author. The archbishop, for example, "populaire et très attentif à se concilier l'opinion de tous, ne dédaignait pas celle des honnêtes gens." The Préfet was one of those "ayant coutume d'écouter par la bouche." As responsible to the Government of France under the Republic of the style 1895–7, his aim was

"que les ministres pussent jouir en paix de cette commune indifférence qui, gagnant leurs amis comme leurs ennemis, assurait en même temps leur force et leur repos."

The press of the chief town of the Department does not come in for praise: "La feuille socialiste, seule pure, était seule violente." The superior of the seminary, a great priest, and one of the professors of the local branch of the University, a leading atheist, are the firmest of friends:—

"Seuls dans la ville ils s'intéressaient aux idées générales. Cette sympathie les réunissait. En philosophant sous les quinconces, quand le temps était beau, ils se consolaient, l'un des tristesses du célibat, l'autre des tracas de la famille; tous deux, de leurs ennuis professionnels et de leur égale impopularité."

Another priest falls out with the Préfet (who wants to make a bishop of him) over a modern miracle, which the Préfet will not tolerate, while the great preacher does not want to be called upon to pronounce for one side or the other; but the Préfet insists that his candidate for episcopal honours shall cause a newspaper, over which he has indirect influence, to "cesser la campagne qu'ils mènent pour le succès d'un miracle inconstitutionnel et anticoncordataire." One observation that M. France makes about the Republic is of real political value and important:—

"En considérant les chances d'une guerre, les autres gouvernements n'ont à redouter que la défaite. Le nôtre craint également, avec juste raison, la victoire et la défaite. Cette crainte salutaire nous assure la paix, qui est le plus grand des biens."

SPORTING LITERATURE.

The second volume of the "Sportsman's Library," edited by Sir Herbert Maxwell, is a reprint of A Sporting Tour through the Northern Parts of England and Great Part of the Highlands of Scotland, by Col. T. Thornton (Arnold), whose book was originally published in 1804, and was unfavourably reviewed next year in the Edinburgh by no less a person than Sir Walter Scott. Notwithstanding it has much to interest both sportsmen and other visitors to Scotland; the former will notice many changes, some for the worse, since the colonel's day. They can no longer travel all through the heart of the Highlands with their establishment and try for game where the cover seems likely, nor will they find salmon in scores at the Falls of Clyde. On the other hand, the journey, instead of being an expensive affair, extending over several weeks and involving risk occasionally and hardship often, is now performed daily with much ease and certainty at small cost. Col. Thornton selected his route with commendable taste, and contrived to see a great deal of the finest Scotch scenery south of Inverness. Loch Lomond, Loch Tay, the Grampians, and Strathspey were visited, and the descriptions are good. Some of his shots were incredibly long, and parts of his fishing stories seem to verge on the poetical; but to an angler a lively imagination is conceded. The book is well chosen for reproduction, which has been successful, specially, we think, in the reduction of the engravings from Garrard's pictures.

The Poetry of Sport, selected by Hedley Peek (Longmans & Co.), forms the twenty-eighth, and for the present the last, volume of the "Badminton Library." Tastes no doubt differ, but it is open to question whether a collection of verse, in which mediocrity is even more than usually prevalent, is an appropriate ending to a series generally good, and occasionally by common consent the standard authority on certain forms of sport. Probably a comprehensive and well-arranged bibliography would have been more useful, though it would have involved greater labour. Curiously enough, this has recently been supplied for shooting by Mr. Wirt Gerrare, whose work is noticed below; and perhaps in time similar information may be collected for other sports and pastimes. While the volume could scarcely support an independent existence, and for success must be indebted to an admirable series, yet much that is amusing may be found amongst its pages, not the least so being Mr. Outwood's imitations of Mr. Rudyard Kipling. See the following extract from 'Bookey':—

Yes, making mock of those you use, and for your pleasure keep,
Is cheaper far than honour—and with some that's deucèd cheap;
And betting with a Bookey, on a certain tip you've got,
Is safer far than it would be with some of your own lot.
Then it's Bookey this, and Bookey that, and "Bookey, don't come near";
But it's "Where's my good friend Dickey Jones?" when the numbers do appear;
When the numbers do appear at last, the numbers do appear;
O it's "Where's my best of Bookeys?" when the numbers do appear.

Mr. Watson, the assistant editor, in an interesting preface records the history of the series. The project first took shape some fifteen years ago, when a new edition of Blaine's 'Encyclopædia of Rural Sports' was under consideration, and gradually grew to its present dimensions. Whilst the "Badminton Library" was being written new pastimes requiring new volumes came into fashion, and most likely others will follow, so that it would be rash to say that the series was ended. The Duke of Beaufort is the editor, and Mr. Watson says his control was minute, relating in proof an incident in which his Grace is made to speak of "the Coldstreams" instead of the Coldstream Guards, a slip we should not have expected from that quarter. "The absolutely indefatigable labours of Mr. T. Norton Longman" are justly praised. It may easily be believed that the library owes more to his sound judgment, powers of conciliation, and persuasion than it does to any other person concerned, but we hereby tender to all our sincere congratulations. The idea of an encyclopædia or series of books on sports is a very old one. The 'Maison Rustique; or, the Countrie Farme,' printed in London for Bonham Norton, 1600, was followed by Richard Blome's 'Gentleman's Recreation,' 1686, and that in turn by various sporting dictionaries, which held the field till early in the present century. These, with the famous Sporting Magazine, bring us down to Blaine's 'Encyclopædia of Rural Sports,' 1840, already mentioned as preceding the "Badminton Library." The illustrations of Mr. Peek's volume are numerous, some of the reproductions of old prints being decidedly interesting. Of the newer style Mr. Thorburn's game birds are, like most of his work, admirable in fidelity; Mr. Lucien Davis's young ladies are as usual attractive, and Mr. Brock's work also deserves praise.

"So many books have been written upon guns and shooting that no apology is needed for publishing a guide to them" is the opinion expressed by Mr. Wirt Gerrare in introducing A Bibliography of Guns and Shooting (Roxburghe Press). We agree with him, and have no doubt that the compilation will prove of great value to future writers on the subject, perhaps even to book collectors, for the work appears to have been carefully done. Classification of the books which date from 1459 to 1850 is mainly chronological; after 1850 the works are divided according to nationality, and subdivided into "those relating to arms generally, to particular descriptions of arms, to the technicalities of gun-making, to the proof of guns.....and, lastly, to sport with the gun at home and abroad." Modern military treatises on ordnance, war, &c., Russian sporting books (because of typographical difficulties), and foreign works of little interest are excluded; but the principle on which the selection is made is not defined. As might reasonably be expected, the class of authors has been considerably recruited from that of gunmakers, the best-known books, perhaps, in this country being those by J. D. Dougall, of Glasgow, and by the Greeners of Birmingham, whose works, specially those by W. W. Greener, have been translated into many languages and widely read. Mr. Wirt Gerrare has views of his own on shooting; he affirms that the old love of sport is extinct or so modified as to baffle recognition:

"Scotch shooting appears more as a fashion, deer-stalking a function, and grouse shooting an exhibition in which the society man, and often the society woman, is expected to share."

He further considers it probable that either for war or sport hand firearms are doomed in future to play but a subordinate part, being in the former case superseded by machine guns, whilst the sportsman is to develope into a being who enjoys closer harmony with nature. We cannot agree, though unquestionably great changes are taking place; the class of well-to-do people who willingly paid from 100*l.* to 250*l.* for shootings are being rapidly driven out of the field by the competition of rich men, and in war, though its machinery is vastly improved, yet recent practice shows that unflinching courage and self-devotion place cold steel much more nearly on a level with villainous saltpetre than many persons imagine. Of omissions and errors we have noticed few. Under entries 1335, p. 118, and 044, p. 211, the author's name should be Pollok, and it may be remarked that his volumes are scarcely of sufficient authority to warrant inclusion; at entry 040, p. 210, "Bara, Bagahab," should be Bara Baghál. No mention seems to be made of an excellent little book called 'The Sporting Rifle and its Projectiles,' by Lieut. James Forsyth, 1863 (Smith, Elder & Co.), which was specially important because the great value of a flat trajectory at sporting ranges was brought to notice, and practical improvements in rifles, not yet wholly superseded, were made and recorded. The index is scarcely satisfactory; the title as well as the author's name should be included. Two names we have chanced to look for—Blome, whose work is described on p. 38, and Fosberry, the inventor, we believe, of the type of weapon sold under various names (Paradox, &c.), from which shot as well as ball may be fired—are not to be found. The type and general appearance of the volume are to be commended.

HISTORICAL ROMANCES.

The Witch-Finder. By T. Pellatt. (Smith, Elder & Co.)—The recent revival of the historical novel and the success which has attended a few essays in that line have had their natural effect; and young writers, not realizing that no form of fiction requires so much labour as that which involves a thorough saturation with the manners, speech, and general mode of thought belonging to a past age, dash with a light heart into a field where for one success there are certain to be a hundred failures. It is significant that in France—where, in spite of faults of taste, subject, invention, the "theory" of the novel is better understood than elsewhere, and where the historical novel has perhaps found its most brilliant exponent—modern writers should have fought so conspicuously shy of taking up the mantle of Dumas. Some Germans have, it is true, sought to impart archæological learning under the garb of fiction, and their archæology was and is doubtless good enough; but then the fiction suffers till one hardly knows which is the pill and which the sugar. But both French and Germans are well aware that a good deal more is needed to make an historical novel pass muster than the occasional use of forms like "'twas" or "withdrawing-room," or of the second person singular, or even than a description of the battle of Edgehill. They would not venture upon a story dealing with the first half of the seventeenth century without ascertaining, for instance, whether an Englishman of that period could conceivably have borne such a name as "Francis Fettyplace Powis," or an English girl have been "put aside in a close house of Nuns, for to be made a woman of religion," in the felicitous diction of an imaginary document quoted in the course of the story. They would have known that the name "Puritan," to denote a particular way of thinking, was in general use long before 1638, and that it was not more usual then than now for a prisoner upon trial for murder to be cross-examined by the presiding judge. The general character of the incidents makes one suspect that the inspiration of the book is to be sought in the writings of the late Mr. W. H. Ainsworth. What satisfied Ainsworth's generation will, however, hardly pass muster now; and so far as we remember that master's works he would hardly have been guilty either of the historical laxities indicated above, or of such a sentence as:—

"He remembered.....till his dying day.....a quantity of black scarves and kid-skin gloves, which Nanny the plump serving-wench held on a tray, and whose round red face belied the expression of borrowed melancholy that she put upon it."

In geography — at least that of the district round Banbury — Mr. Pellatt is fairly well grounded; but his grammar and history would, we fear, hardly satisfy Her Majesty's inspector.

The disturbed condition of the Border at the end of Elizabeth's reign and during the first years of the union of the crowns, though it has produced some of our best ballads, as 'The Raid of the Reidswire' and 'Lord Maxwell's Good Night,' has never been so favourite a theme of prose romance as its wealth of suggestion might readily have indicated. In The Provost-Marshal (Blackwood & Sons) the Hon. Frederick Moncreiff has shown, as one might expect, sympathy with a picturesque if rugged chapter of Scots history, a considerable familiarity with genealogical bypaths, and a moderate and facile use of the native tongue as spoken by the gentle classes of his countrymen, and here rather indicated, for recognition by those to the manner born, than emphasized by the eccentricities of spelling which are thought necessary to enforce the modern speech upon the irresponsive Southron. Our doubt is whether the same Southron, even the educated specimen who yearly visits the Celtic part of Scotland, will not require a good many historical notes before he can appreciate the merits of this study of a corner of feudal society in the years 1599–1608. But granting him to have a perfect blank where Scotch history should have a niche in his mind, the very well-sustained dialogue through which the incidents mainly unfold themselves will, we trust, secure his attention to the fortunes of Robin Maxwell, de jure of Rantry; his wicked uncles, clerical and lay; and his two cousins, Katharine and Barbara, the one a hard woman of the world in which she reigns a beauty, the other the milder of mood, to whom one who has outgrown calf-love may turn in confidence for permanent consolation. Nor can the tragedy of "Johnston's" murder (the chief, if he could write, no doubt used the correcter form Johnstoun) fail, we think, to evoke some interest. The feud of Johnston and Maxwell, in which each clan lost two successive chiefs, was one of the most salient and complete of these wild dramas. We cannot think that our author counts among his gifts any epic or dramatic fire. Did he possess a spark of it, he would have worked up the circumstances of Maxwell's crime to make it stand out beyond any incident in the book. As it is, the narration is historically correct, but it lacks the verve which might have been caught from the ballad:—

Adieu! Drumlanrig, fause writ aye,
And Closeburn in a band,
The Laird of Lag, from my father that fled
When the Johnston cut off his hand.

Not that our author is neglectful of local colour. His incidental sketch of the Sir Wilfrid Lawson of the time is amusing; and Maxwell of Orchardstane takes his proper place. Poor King James VI. receives more posthumous insults. He is credited with hungering for the forfeiture of Lord Maxwell; and the hard treatment of the Graemes of the Debatable Land is attributed to his personal instructions to Cranstoun. "Thou shalt want ere I want" might have been, according to Mr. Moncreiff, adopted as a motto by the Crown.

Alethea: at the Parting of the Ways. By Cyril. (Burns & Oates.)—Even for an historical romance 'Alethea' is unusually dull. The story is laid at Constantinople in the reigns of Michael the Drunkard and Basil the Macedonian, in the ninth century; but Cyril has spoilt a subject which in the hands of a writer capable of constructing a plot might be shaped into an interesting tale. We suspect, however, that the motive of Cyril in composing this crude and silly book was theological rather than artistic. He is evidently a Catholic—possibly a convert to Catholicism — writing with a strong bias of animosity against the Greek Church. The learned Patriarch Photius appears in these pages as a thoroughgoing scoundrel; Pope Nicholas I. is idealized. The concluding chapter lets us see that Cyril intends his work as a sort of answer to the "holy words" which the Greek Church recently addressed to Leo XIII. Mistakes abound. We meet, for example, Anaximanes, Taraesius, Michael Rangabus, Gregory Nazianzum, Selembria, and a Metropolitan of Armoricum. The Latin Notitia of Constantinople is printed at the end of the book, one cannot imagine why.

FRENCH AND GERMAN SCHOOL-BOOKS.

Mr. Siepmann's Public School German Primer (Macmillan) is an excellent book. The Reader is rightly made the chief feature of the work; the Grammar is intended to explain the passages included in the Reader; and the exercises are designed to afford practice in the knowledge acquired in the Grammar. The system is not new, but it is sound, and has been carefully carried out; at the same time we do not quite understand why the vocabularies do not contain all the words to be found in the Reader. Generally speaking, the book errs in being too elaborate. Like most teachers, Mr. Siepmann overrates the capacity of boys. The section on pronunciation should have been omitted, for pronunciation should be learnt orally from the teacher, not by getting up so many pages of rules; and the classification of the irregular verbs is too complicated. It is hardly worth adding that Mr. Siepmann's patriotism leads him into inaccurate history. It is probably unwise to make an exercise out of the events of the Franco-Prussian War, but at any rate it is not true that at Mars la Tour "80,000 Germans defeated 190,000 French, and drove them into Metz."

Mrs. J. G. Frazer's Scenes of Familiar Life, arranged progressively for Students of Colloquial French, in Macmillan's "Primary Series," are well adapted for their purpose. The dialogues are lively and amusing, and will attract young people. The weak point is the vocabulary, which is incomplete.

Mr. Bally's manual of German Commercial Correspondence (Methuen & Co.) is carefully compiled and will be found of service.

Mr. Tarver's abridgment of Vingt Ans Après (Arnold) makes a good reading book, and will interest schoolboys. The notes are brief, but to the point, as might be expected from a teacher of Mr. Tarver's experience.

FOLK-TALES.

Maori Tales and Legends. By Kate M'Cosh Clark. (Nutt.)—If a tithe of the zeal for story collecting which now animates residents in Australia, New Zealand, and remote parts of the earth had but been shown fifty years ago, we should doubtless have had much more genuine and valuable folk-tales. Not that the reader will be ungrateful for the goodly number which Mrs. Clark has gathered together; many of them are excellent, and nearly all contain fragments of folk-lore. Even among the Maoris is found the old and all but universal belief that if the living who penetrate to the underworld allow themselves to be persuaded to taste food there, no return to light or life is possible. The Maori storehouses of provisions are "carefully placed north and south, so that the dead on their way westward to the spirit land should not pass over them and so injure the food." Some of the stories are all folk-lore. The best of these is 'Rangi and Papatua; or, the Heavens and the Earth,' which loved each other, "and were ever so near together and so inseparable.....that only a dull twilight reigned between them. No stately forest trees could grow or bright flowers blossom," and the children of Rangi and Papatua led a dull, discontented existence, longing for air and light, until at last Tané, the strongest son, kicked his father with such strength that he was sent up to the sky and had to stay there, after which the earth became fruitful and habitable. This Creation myth is not new, but it is really striking and well told, and would be much better if Mrs. Clark had avoided fine writing, which is quite out of place in folk-tales. A savage man's attempts to account for his own existence and that of the world in which he dwells can scarcely be related too simply.

Australian Legendary Tales. By Mrs. K. Langloh Parker. (Nutt.)—"But have the blacks any legends?" asked a friend of Mrs. Parker's when she heard that that lady was carefully taking down the folk-tales of the Noongahburrahs, or Narran tribe, in Australia, among whom she and her husband have dwelt for twenty years. We should feel thankful to Mrs. Parker if she had done nothing but record the fact that the old Noongahburrahs laugh now when they remember the coming of "Mitchellan," as they call Major Mitchell, fifty years ago; and how afraid their mothers were of the wheel tracks he made, the first they had ever seen; and how the said mothers would not let the children tread on these wheel-tracks, but carefully lifted them over lest their feet should break out in sores, as they were supposed to do if they trod on a snake's track. This is a valuable bit of folk-lore, and Mrs. Parker has also gathered together an excellent collection of folk-tales, which have manifestly been taken down just as she heard them. There is no straining after knowledge of the unseen in them; almost all are the stories of a people who, to use a North-Country expression, have had "to fend for their living," and deal, directly or indirectly, with the difficulties encountered by men who are contending with the forces of nature or their fellow men's strength and craft. Food and water and the preservation of their own tools and weapons, or the acquisition of those of their neighbours, are nearly always the objects for which they fight. Beautiful wives are cared for, but not much more than a fine fat emu with a prospect of one or two good meals off it. Every man's hand is against even his brother's. Those who discover the secret of obtaining fire jealously keep it to themselves as long as possible ; those who make rain do likewise. The words of the rain spell are

Moogaray, Moogaray, May, May,
Eehu, Eehu, Doongarah.

These were always chanted. First the rain-makers would begin very slowly and softly, gradually getting quicker and louder, until at length they almost shrieked. The words they said meant, "Come, hailstones ; come, wind ; come, rain ; come, lightning." Birds and beasts also wage a war of treachery against each other, as witness the story of Dinewan the emu and Goomblegubbon the bustard, and many others of the like kind. The book contains a short glossary, which might with advantage be longer, a very good and interesting introduction by Mr. Andrew Lang, a specimen of the tales in their native form, and some fascinating illustrations by an untaught Australian native.

Fairy Tales from Finland. From the Swedish of Z. Topelius by E. R. Christie. (Fisher Unwin.)—Both as a poet and a novelist, Zacharias Topelius is undoubtedly one of the most popular of modern Scandinavian authors. In Finland, especially, critics assign him a place not very far below that of Rüneburg himself. Abroad, too, his reputation is on the increase. Old-fashioned folks in Germany regard him as one of the most admirably edifying of writers for the young, and in America the whole cycle of his celebrated 'Fältskärns Berättelser' has been translated over and over again. Topelius is certainly a born teller of tales ; even in that difficult genre the historical romance he has done work of merit, though nobody would think of putting him on a level with such masters as Tolstoi, Sienkiewicz, and Jókai. His tales for children are more disappointing. They are full of tender feeling, gentle gaiety, and pretty poetical conceits, but it has always seemed to us that the moral element, which pervades them all more or less, is somewhat too obtrusive. In a word, Topelius is too serious to be quite successful with children. Compared with the Andersenian Märchen, the best the amiable Swede can offer us is poor indeed. The present selection, moreover, is not a good one, and a translator who could render the phrase "sin mund var på sned" (his mouth was awry) by "his mouth was on the cross" should take a few more lessons in Swedish before trying her prentice hand on a Swedish classic.

ECCLESIASTICAL HISTORY.

The Rev. F. C. Woodhouse, the author of Monasticism, Ancient and Modern (Gardner, Darton & Co.), is convinced that brotherhoods of a more or less monastic character should be made part of the organization of the Church of England. His exposition of his views on this question will doubtless find grateful acceptance among those who share his opinions, but the historical part of the work cannot be considered adequate even within the limits the author has assigned himself. These are explained by the sub-title : "[Monasticism] Its Principles, Origin, Development, Triumphs, Decadence, and Suppression ; with an Enquiry as to the Possibility of its Revival." Good handbooks of the monastic orders, ancient or modern, are sorely needed ; but one short volume, however perfectly arranged and skilfully executed, cannot adequately be a handbook to ancient, mediæval, and modern orders, Eastern as well as Western, and at the same time do for the Church of England the work of a St. Benedict, a St. Francis, or a Loyola. The present work aspires to achieve all these things in some sort, and to achieve them by means of extracts culled from such various works as Hare's 'Biographical Sketches,' Wilson's 'Abode of Snow,' and Mr. Crawford's 'Mr. Isaacs' ; within the first twenty pages of the book, which deal with the "Theory and Principle of Monasticism," these references occur ; elsewhere Gibbon, Mr. Lecky, and Dr. Creighton rub shoulders as authorities with Mr. Baring-Gould and Mr. B. W. Maturin. By far the larger part of the book is in inverted commas, and appears to be little more than a reprint of the author's book of extracts. With a vast subject and limited space the utmost care was required to secure good arrangement ; nevertheless the extracts and the passages that couple them are thrown together in great disorder. The little we are to know about St. Patrick is placed before us four times, in chapters entitled respectively "Origin of Monasticism," "Growth and Work of Monasticism," "Monasticism in Britain," and "Monasticism in Ireland." Nor are all the passages harmonized ; in one chapter all St. Patrick's knowledge of monasticism comes from Lerins, in another from Marmoutier. Lists of names are put together without heed to chronology, geography, legend, or authentic history. Concerning nunneries, we learn, in brief, that

"St. Werburg, St. Etheldreda, St. Hilda, St. Bega were abbesses in Britain in the seventh century. St. Gertrude, daughter of Pepin, in France, and St. Winifred, a lady of noble rank in Wales, St. Frideswide, an English princess, St. Ebba, abbess of Coldingham, the Empress Theodora,..... were all remarkable as members of Religious Orders, in different periods of Church history."

If St. Bega be Heiu (and we may well wonder who she is), then the first four ladies are put in inverted chronological order ; there is no reason to believe that Gertrude was Pepin's daughter ; Winifred and Frideswide are saints of legend rather than of history. Surely the Empress Theodora's involuntary retirement from the world gives her a strange claim to appear in this society. Among the offshoots of the Benedictine Order are numbered "the Augustine Canons" and the Order of Premontré. Elsewhere, however, we learn that the writer knows this is a mistake ; but when, on the next page, we find that the Augustine Canons of Canterbury sent their abbots to Parliament confusion is confounded. The Carthusians occur in the midst of a list of the Friars, and the same list concludes with the Order of Grandmont. A short account of Benedict Biscop divides Canute from Edward the Confessor ; and amongst other minor errors we are told that Dunstan went to Fluery (sic), that Archbishop Ælfric is identical with Ælfric the author, that Crowland (the false Ingulf still holds his own) had a library of 700 books in 1091, and that Wolsey dissolved Cluniac monasteries in 1525. The Brigettines of Syon are darkly alluded to as "the Austin Friars of Brentford." The author provides a list of sisterhoods belonging to the Church of England, and prints a collection of the opinions of Churchmen on the question, which he has set himself to answer. A small part of the book is his own, is written with enthusiasm and from the heart, and is not mere threadbare compilation. No detailed scheme for the creation of brotherhoods is propounded, and this study in monasticism serves rather to raise than to solve the problems which must be faced before a scheme of Protestant monasticism can be developed. The past and the present are full of warnings, but something more than warning is needed to awaken that profound spiritual longing which alone can produce a new and fruitful religious order.

A History of Auricular Confession and Indulgences in the Latin Church. By Henry Charles Lea, LL.D.—Vol. III. Indulgences. (Sonnenschein & Co.)—The earlier volumes of this work, dealing with the subject of confession, were noticed in these columns some time ago. The third volume, dealing with indulgences, forms a complete treatise by itself. What was formerly said of Dr. Lea's method of procedure applies to this volume also. The notes present a forest of authorities for the statements of the text, but nothing is done to enable the reader to weigh the value of the evidence thus quoted, and the book thus comes to be one which only experts in the subject can understand. The style, except that it lapses occasionally into the slipshod, is well suited to the theme. The writer is keenly interested in his subject, but he does not obtrude his own views or feelings with respect to it. A Protestant writer who feels called to set forth the system of indulgences of the Latin Church certainly does well to let the facts speak for themselves, merely arranging them so that their true significance and interdependence shall appear in a clear light. To say that Dr. Lea does this is to pay him the best compliment the case admits of. The book opens with a chapter on general theories of the subject ; here we learn at what period the system arose and what an indulgence is in point of logic. An indulgence is a payment to God out of the treasure which the Church has at her disposal from the excess of the merits of the saints, and is offered in order to shorten the period of penance a man has to suffer for his sins in this life or in purgatory. Only the Pope was considered at first to have power to draw upon the treasure, and it was the punishment and not the guilt that was supposed to be remitted, though indulgences a culpa afterwards came to be recognized. As we read on, we meet with one after another of the formidable difficulties which could not fail to flow from the admission of such a principle. When various indulgences were gained for different periods a man's account was apt to become complicated. Could the indulgence be gained again and again as often as the simple forms were repeated which ensured it? Did an indulgence count when a man had committed a sin in the expectation of obtaining it? Did the intention of the penitent matter, or was the indulgence effective ex opere operato? With regard to each of these questions the opinions of Catholic authorities are marshalled on one side and the other, and the practice of the Church shown from bulls and chronicles, no doubt with a good deal of mutation from century to century and from land to land. The main principles of the system being set forth, we are shown what use the Church made of it. In the period before the Crusades it was used sparingly, but then it met with great extension, a sum of money being accepted in lieu of the pilgrimage to purchase the needed boon. The granting of indulgences became an important source of revenue for the Holy See, and the abuses of pilgrimages to Rome and of the sale of pardons began to spring up of which so much was heard at the Reformation. Dr. Lea gives a chapter each to indulgenced objects, apocryphal indulgences, and the stations of Rome ; and many other features of the system are discussed which our space forbids us to mention. In speaking of the present position of the Church on this matter, Dr. Lea states the view that the immense multiplication of indulgences in modern times has caused the Church of Rome virtually to abandon her penitential system ; but the conviction is expressed that that Church has not lost her power of adapting herself to those she rules, and that her influence is not likely to decay in the near future. In such a work as this many a curiosity is met with. The Protestant may possibly look with envy at such an instrument as indulgences for raising money for Church purposes. The preacher will mark that indulgences have been granted as an inducement to stay to the end of the sermon ; the religious writer that they have been conceded as a reward for reading the book of a local divine. When we read of a person obtaining indulgence for the period of 30,800 years we wish for a sight of the other side of his pass-book. Dr. Lea travels little beyond his immediate theme ; he might have found curious illustrations of his subject in Rabbinical theology, where also there is a trafficking in the surplus merits of the saints, and the account of the individual with heaven might become extremely complicated. We believe this book to be one of permanent value.

In his Religious Thought in England in the Nineteenth Century (Gibbings & Co.) Dr. John Hunt has shown the same spirit of research and effort at impartiality which distinguish his work on 'Religious Thought in England from the Reformation till the Close of the Last Century.' He is careful not to obtrude his own opinions, which are apparently on the side of the Broad Church party, and his book consists mainly of brief analyses of the writings of various divines, so that it rather furnishes the materials for a history than is itself a history. The abstracts of a long series of Bampton Lectures form melancholy reading. In the early years of the century we find forgotten theologians maintaining, in spite of Paley's warning, that the literal truth of the first chapter of Genesis is a fundamental doctrine of Christianity; and down to quite recently the preacher too often defends as vital views now generally abandoned. Dr. Hunt devotes ample space to the opinions of Dr. Martineau and the Unitarians, but he is silent in regard to the orthodox Nonconformists, not even noticing the tendency they have exhibited of late years to abandon, or at least minimize the importance of, dogma.

Richard Cameron, in the "Famous Scots" series, by Prof. John Herkless (Edinburgh, Oliphant, Anderson & Ferrier), is a well-written little life of one who gave name to a moribund sect and to a well-known regiment. Except for the last year of his brief existence (c. 1648–80), familiar to readers of Mr. Crockett's 'Men of the Moss Hags,' hardly anything is known about him. "The materials for a biography," says the preface, "were so scanty that I grew alarmed, wondering how I was to make out my tale of bricks with so little straw." That Cameron matriculated at St. Andrews on March 5th, 1662, and graduated M.A. on July 22nd, 1665, is here for the first time recorded; that "he left Falkland to become chaplain to Sir William Scott of Harden in Selkirkshire" (Roxburghshire) is, we imagine, a conjectural emendation. Hitherto it has always been a "Sir Walter Scott," who finds no place in the Harden pedigree.

OUR LIBRARY TABLE.

Messrs. Blackwood & Sons publish The Land of the Dollar, by Mr. G. W. Steevens, who went to the United States for the Daily Mail during the Presidential campaign and election, and who sent home letters which attracted much attention, and are now republished. The author modestly says that they relate "the gradual initiation of an ignorant but unprejudiced Englishman into American institutions and character." Mr. Steevens is an extremely able journalist, and, while his letters show that he went to the United States knowing little of the country, he has managed to give a view of it which will be found highly suggestive even by those who know it best. His concluding chapter, which contains a letter dated from London after his return, and called "The American," is enough in itself to show the political student how fast the world has travelled since Tocqueville. Mr. Steevens goes so far as to say that "while often hidebound by convention, America is magnificently free from intolerance." The French political philosopher, it will be remembered, while pointing out all the best side of that "equality of condition" which for him constituted American democracy, foresaw its worst side in its future certain intolerance of all opinion, except the opinion of the majority. Perhaps the most interesting part of Mr. Steevens's book is that which is most new: his examination of the young American navy, and his opinion that the Republic will certainly soon obtain the absolute command of the sea against the whole world, and that she is animated by sentiments towards us very different from those which we entertain towards her.

Messrs. Hodder & Stoughton publish Armenia and Europe: an Indictment, by Dr. Lepsius, edited by Mr. Rendel Harris, and containing an account of the Armenian massacres more detailed even than the full account given in the Blue-books. A note on the more recent massacre at Constantinople states that the attack on the Ottoman Bank was "by a handful of Armenians from Russia." The "from Russia" may possibly be correct as regards some of them, but undoubtedly those among the bomb-throwers of whom we know most were Constantinople porters.

Messrs. Charles Griffin & Co. publish an admirable Manual of Elementary Seamanship, by Capt. Wilson-Barker of the Worcester, which seems to us perfectly designed as an elementary handbook and which excellently holds its place in "Griffin's Nautical Series." No doubt much of its teaching is in the nature of a counsel of perfection, and we fear that in all but the best ships of the best lines Part VI. ("Miscellaneous: Notes on Points of Etiquette; Keeping and Relieving Watch, &c.") will continue to be disregarded. Still it is only by the efforts of men like Capt. Wilson-Barker that young officers of the merchant navy can be trained up to become master mariners of the best type, such as that to which the author himself belongs. Although the book is intended for those who are to become officers of the merchant navy, it will be found useful by all yachtsmen.

"Griffin's Nautical Series" is edited by Capt. Blackmore, and he is responsible for one of the volumes included in it—The British Mercantile Marine (Griffin & Co.). This is mainly an historical account of the rise and progress of British shipping, but it is founded on a series of papers written for and read before the Shipmasters' Society in London. It brings up to date the 'History of Shipping' of that distinguished shipowner the late W. S. Lindsay, Cobden's friend; but it is written less from the shipowners' and more from the master mariners' point of view. The volume bears largely on the education and training of merchant seamen, and upon present discussions with regard to manning and the employment of aliens in our mercantile marine.

M. Hamilton, the author of 'A Self-Denying Ordinance' and 'Across an Ulster Bog,' has not belied their promise in McLeod of the Camerons (Heinemann). The character of McLeod, throwing himself energetically into the many interests and duties of a soldier who makes the most of his profession, but dogged by the fear that insanity, which has once overshadowed his life, must again involve him, is a painful, but not ignoble study. Christina, who becomes the friend of this reserved and conscientious man, and, unwittingly to both, thaws the coldness which he makes his defence against a passion he dares not acknowledge, is a character of more complexity. In her girlhood (she is the daughter of an aristocratic house) she makes a clandestine marriage with a naval engineer, and after three years' separation joins her husband at Malta for the first time at the commencement of the story. George Stoddart is an entirely commonplace specimen of the Manchester trading class, with a certain sailor-like swagger superinduced, a naïve aspiration to rise in society through the reflected merit of his wife, and an utter incapacity to perceive any personal inferiority on his own part, or to suspect the wrong he has done to a cultured and high-spirited girl by taking advantage of her inexperience. The shock which paralyzes Christina's best intentions when she realizes the manner of man to whom she is bound for life is not lessened by her daily experience of the petty slights and social obstacles to which life in a garrison exposes her. Her literary tastes, which at first she represses at her husband's instance, lead her to make a confidant of McLeod, who is in that, as in most respects, a kindred spirit. There is considerable vivacity in the description of life on board ship and among the Cameron Highlanders and their numerous acquaintances at Malta, and many of the men and women of the official world may have been drawn from the life. But the climax, when Christina's loyalty is so highly tried, and the catastrophe, when the man she has begun to love attempts her life and his own, are the most stirring parts of the story. Christina's self-reproach when she thinks that she has been an accomplice in his suicide, and the revulsion of feeling when she finds that her hero has realized and rejected the baseness of making her contribute to the fate he chooses for himself, are powerfully described. A narrow path is that of duty, to which the disillusioned wife returns, but it grows endurable and not entirely uncheerful, which is the highest level of happiness attained in many lives.

Miss Georgiana Stisted is quite right in thinking that there is room for a popular biography of Richard Burton. The achievements of a man of his great endowments deserve to be known to the general public; but unfortunately The True Life of Capt. Sir Richard Burton (Nichols) shows her to be hardly possessed of literary skill sufficient for the task, and her attack on Lady Burton is scarcely judicious. It is quite true that Burton had no sympathy with his wife's religion, and that her excessive attachment to it led her into somewhat absurd demonstrations after his death; but it is difficult to see the necessity of dwelling on the matter.

Enrico Corradini belongs to the new Italian school of which Gabriello d'Annunzio is the leader, whose motto is "Multa renascentur," and who desire to bring about that Latin neo-Renaissance aspired after by De Vogüé. If this school have no other merits, they have certainly this (and it is no trifling one), that they aim at expelling the disfiguring Gallicisms that have of late crept into Italian prose, thanks to careless and uncultured newspaper writers and popular novelists. Of D'Annunzio's followers, Enrico Corradini is one of the most eminent, and the diction of his Santamaura (Florence, Paggi) cannot be too highly praised. He has revived many beautiful old trecentisti words and forms, and has revised his style with artistic care. The matter is, perhaps, a little too uniformly sombre in colour, but none the less interesting on that account. It is a story of psychological heredity and analysis, dealing with a would-be philanthropist who falsely interprets his mission, thus working not only his own ruin, but that of all his family—a melancholy tale, devoid of one gleam of sunlight or one feature to redeem its gloom, but throughout ably told and well sustained.

Volumes V. and VI. of the superb edition of Mr. Meredith's novels which Messrs. Constable & Co. are publishing contains Sandra Belloni, or, to call it by the name under which it first appeared, 'Emilia in England,' which, when published in 1864, we pronounced "a charming story" which "we recommend our readers to get for themselves." We have seen no reason to change our opinion.—The perennial popularity of Westward Ho! is shown by the appearance of yet another edition in Messrs. Macmillan's "Illustrated Standard Novels." The illustrations, which are by Mr. Brock, are fair; but he has done better work. — The handsome reprint in quarto of Mrs. Linnæus Banks's Manchester Man (Manchester, Heywood) is freely and appropriately illustrated by Mr. C. Green and Mr. H. Fitton. An interesting final appendix has been added by Mrs. Banks. It contains additional historical and topographical details.

We have received The Advertiser's A B C: T. B. Browne's Advertisement Press Directory, a bulky volume (T. B. Browne); The Victoria University Calendar for 1897 (Manchester, Cornish); and The University College of North Wales Calendar (same publisher).

We have on our table Life of Her Majesty Queen Victoria, by G. Barnett Smith (Routledge),—To Kumassi with Scott, by G. C. Musgrave (Wightman & Co.),—Indian Sketches and Rambles, by J. B. Daly (Calcutta, Patrick Press),—Elements of Geometry, by A. W. Phillips and I. Fisher (New York, Harper),—The War of the Standards, by A. W. Tourgée (Putnam),—German Social Democracy, by B. JOHN LAMB'S 'POETICAL PIECES.'

Clifton, Bristol, Feb. 1, 1897.

Mr. Bertram Dobell may be interested to learn that the copy of the above modest pamphlet, about which he writes in your last number, was given by me a few years since to my lamented friend James Dykes Campbell. It is one of two copies which came into my hands on the death of the late Mrs. Arthur Tween, of Widford in Hertfordshire.

Mrs. Tween lent me a copy many years ago, when I was editing the 'Essays of Elia,' and I then described the little volume in my notes, and quoted a few lines from 'The Lady's Footman.' Mrs. Tween was unwilling to part with either copy in her lifetime; but after her death her executors kindly allowed me to purchase them, together with some other very interesting relics of the Lamb family. I have never met with a copy elsewhere. As Mr. Dobell points out, one was evidently in the hands of Talfourd when he wrote the first volume of his 'Memorials.'

The story of my acquaintance with Mr. and Mrs. Tween of Widford I hope to tell before long, by printing (with other papers) a lecture which I have more than once given on 'Charles Lamb in Hertfordshire.' I hope to include in the volume the few noticeable verses of John Lamb the elder; for some among them, it must be confessed, are sad doggerel. A touching interest attaches to one poem, 'The Sparrow's Wedding,' which, Talfourd tells us, the writer, when old and in his second childhood, used to delight to hear read to him by his son Charles.

Verax retires from the field without retracting any of his imputations.

The charge made against the S.P.C.K. and the translator of "surreptitiously tampering" with Prof. Maspero's text still, therefore, holds good in his eyes, although he now knows that Prof. Maspero and the translator were in perfect agreement throughout upon the matter. His charge of "bad faith" against the Society is still maintained, although it is now proved to be perfectly baseless.

There is a further charge made by Verax which ought to be of interest to all authors who are fortunate, or unfortunate, enough to have any of their works translated into another language. Such authors, in the eyes of Verax, are not to be allowed to make any arrangement with the translators as to the rendering of statements which, being at best purely problematical, it might be more scientific to take out of a dogmatic form.

Though Prof. Maspero is not aware that he has been subjected to a process in which he has been metamorphosed from a "higher critic" into "an orthodox traditionalist," Verax has superior insight into such matters, and from a "public point of view" feels it necessary to convince Prof. Maspero against his will.

If any one cares to investigate the basis of this latter charge he will have but a light task; he has only to examine again the parallel passages cited by Verax in the Athenæum of January 2nd last, which resolve themselves, as Verax there contended, into the substitution of "narrative" for "tradition," and of a phrase like "some critics imagine" for a slightly less qualified statement of the views held by a certain school.

A TRACT ATTRIBUTED TO MILTON.

33, Norham Road, Oxford.

In Prof. Masson's 'Life of Milton,' vol. iv. pp. 520-523, he discusses and gives some extracts from a pamphlet on Cromwell's dissolution of the Long Parliament, which he sees reason for assigning to Milton. It is entitled 'A Letter to a Gentleman in the Country, touching the Dissolution of the late Parliament and the Reasons thereof.' The title-page bears a motto from Seneca:—

Quæris quo jaceas post obitum loco?
Quo non nata jacent.

"The letter itself is dated 'London, May 3, 1653' and signed merely 'N. L. L.'; but in the Thomason copy of the tract in the British Museum, where 'May 6' is inscribed as the date of publication, the words 'By Mr. John Milton' are also written on the title-page."

Prof. Masson, justly observing that Thomason's note is hardly sufficient evidence of authorship, discusses the contents of the tract, and points out certain passages which might have been written by Milton, and in particular what appears to be an allusion to the poet's blindness.

The real author of this pamphlet was John Hall, of Durham, poet and pamphleteer, 1627–1656. He was the author of a number of pamphlets in defence of the Commonwealth. On May 14th, 1649, the Council of State voted that Mr. Hall should be employed at 100*l.* a year, with assurance of further care, for answering pamphlets against the Commonwealth. His authorship of this particular tract is proved by the following passages:—

"The Generall, after the Parliament was dissolved, imployed one Hall (an atheisticall lawyer of Grays Inne) to write something in vindication of it, for the world's satisfaction, which he hath done but slovenly (which he imputes to his present infirmitys) by way of letter to an absent friend; I suppose you may see it in print; On Tuesday he waited on his Excellency for his reward, the fellow being wholy mercenary; I know not how he spedd."—Newsletter, May 27th, 1653, Clarendon MSS.

In the life of Hall which his friend John Davies, of Kidwelly, prefixed to Hall's posthumously published translation of Hierocles upon the 'Golden Verses' of Pythagoras in 1657, the motto on the title-page is explained:

"The long Parliament, so called, was dissolved the twentieth of April, 1653. The suddennesse of so great a revolution in the publike affairs, was the subject of all, both minds and mouths. This gave Mr. Hall occasion to write that little piece, called, 'A Letter from a Gentleman in the Countrey concerning,' etc., tending to settle the humours of the people in that great emergencie. There was a motto before this book very conceited which gave some occasion to wrest it to the injury of the authour, as if he were not sufficiently satisfied as to the immortality of the soul. It was, out of Seneca, this

Quæris quo jaceas post obitum loco?
Quo non nata jacent.

But Mr. Hall directed it to the present occasion, intending to speak thus much by way of answer to any one should ask, What was become of that great Senate, that had a few dayes before, the reins of three potent nations in their hands, and such an army and navy at their disposall, as never any authority had in England: That it was after its sudden dissolution so lost, as to esteem and veneration, that it might be numbered among the things that were not."—P. 11.

The signature "N. L. L." is, it is evident, simply equivalent to Joh[n] Ha[ll]. He employs it also in one of his earlier pamphlets, 'A True Account and Character of the Times, historically and politically drawn by a Gentleman to give Satisfaction to a Friend in the Country.' This is not dated, but was evidently written in 1647. Neither of the tracts is assigned to Hall in the British Museum Catalogue.

THE 'TESTAMENT OF LOVE.'

Clarendon Press, Oxford.

The author of the pseudo-Chaucerian 'Testament of Love' was certainly not a lucid writer; but I hope in this letter to prove (so far as I know, for the first time) that the bewildering obscurity of his third book is for the most part not his own fault, but is due to extensive dislocations of the text, produced by a disarrangement of the leaves in a MS. The facts on which I base this conclusion are the following. (My references are to page, column, and line of Chalmers's edition.)

1. The sentence beginning 503 a. 68 reads as follows:—

"Thou shalte (quod she) vnderstand that in Heauen is Goddes being .....in which Heauen is euerlasting presence, withouten any mouable tyme there, foole haue I not saied toforne this, as tyme hurleth, right so ayenwarde, tyme healeth and rewardeth," and so on, without any reference to the subject with which the sentence begins.

It is clear that the words after "any mouable tyme there" are out of place. The proper continuation will be found at 509 a. 6, ostensibly in the middle of a sentence:—

"that is nothing preterit or passed, there is nothing future ne comming, but al thinges togider in that place been present euerlasting without any meuing," &c.

These words make no sense where they are placed, the preceding words being, "al though frute faileth one yere or two, yet shall soche a season come some time or other, that shall bringe out frute."

2. The following sentence occurs at 506 b. 53:

"Now trewely lady I haue my ground wel vnderstond, but what thinge is thilke spire that into a tree shoulde wexe: expowne me that thing, that ye therof meane."

The lady's mention of the "spire" ought surely to come before this question, but we find it printed four pages later, at 510 b. 65:—

"Out of this ground moste come the spire, that by processe of tyme shall in greatnesse sprede, to haue branches and blossomes," &c.

3. At 511 b. "the lady" (i. e., Love) gives a long exposition of the difference between "instrument of will" (i. e., will as a faculty) and "affection of will" (i. e., volition). This breaks off abruptly in the middle of a sentence, which is completed by words plainly belonging to some other context, thus:—

"This instrument maie been had, although affect [read effect] and vsage be left out of doynge, as ye haue sight and reason, and yet alway vse ye greatest wisedome in hem shall he be, and thei in God."

I think there is a lacuna of a few words after "yet alway vse ye," which might be filled up something like this: "nat your sighte, ne youre reason, as when ye." If this be granted, the continuation of the sentence will be found at 506 a. 44:—

"Ne ought to loke [ne] thinges with resouning to proue, and so is instrument of wil, will: and yet varieth he from effecte and vsinge both."

The following sentences continue the same subject.

4. At the conclusion of "the lady's" address, at 504 a. 13, the author adds:—

"And with that this lady all at ones starte into my herte: 'here wol I onbide' (quod she) 'for euer, and neuer woll I gone hence, and I woll kepe the from medlynge, while me liste here onbide: thyne entremetyng maners into stedfastnes shullen be chaunged.'"

After this the author begins to speak in his own person to the reader. Now that Love has become an inmate of his heart, his spiritual difficulties are at an end, and it remains for him to expound to others the truths which he has learnt from her. It is natural to expect that thenceforward there will be no more dialogues between the author and Love, but that the author will continue discoursing in his own person until the end of the book. In the text as it is printed this expectation is not fulfilled. "The lady" abruptly resumes her speech a few pages further on; it is not easy to see at what precise point, as her discourse has the appearance of being inextricably mixed up with the author's addresses to her and to the reader.

All these difficulties disappear, and a consecutive and intelligible text is obtained, when the disjointed fragments are rearranged in what I conceive to be their original order. I am sorry that there is no convenient means of exhibiting my reconstruction of the text otherwise than in the repellent form of a series of numerical references to page, column, and line of Chalmers's edition. I trust that those who are interested in the subject, and have access to the edition referred to, will not grudge the trouble of testing my results by referring to the book. My scheme of arrangement is as follows:

1. From the beginning to 503 b. 2 ('any mouable tyme there").
2. From 509 a. 6 ("that is nothing preterit") to the end of 510 b. ("euer to onbide").
3. From 506 b. 54 ("Nowe trewely lady") to 508 a. 30 ("of which ye first mened").
4. From 511 a. 1 ("Nowe lady, quod I") to 511 b. 54 ("and yet alway vse ye").
5. From 506 a. 44 ("ne oughte to loke") to 506 b. 54 ("of that knotte").
6. From 508 a. 31 ("very trouthe") to 509 a. 6 ("shal bringe out frute").
7. From 503 b. 2 ("fole haue I nat sayd") to 506 a. 44 ("god is the greatest loue").
8. From 511 b. 54 ("and the greatest wisedome") to the end.

Students of the 'Testament of Love' (if such there be) will remember that some years ago Prof. Skeat discovered that the initial letters of the sections formed an acrostic, reading "Margaret of virtw, have merci on T.S.K.N.V.I." Prof. Skeat thought that the concluding letters were an anagram on the author's name, which he supposed to be Kitsun. I always felt that the assumption of an anagram was extremely improbable, but was unable to make any better suggestion. When I had completed my rearrangement of the text I was naturally curious to see whether my transpositions had rendered it possible to read the acrostic straightforward; and on examination I discovered the correct order of the mysterious initials to be T.H.I.N. V.S.K. (The H is the first letter of the sentence "Here of this matere," &c., which in Chalmers is printed without break, but in the editio princeps is clearly marked as the beginning of a section, though Thynne's printer has omitted the ornamental initial.) I have for a long time felt all but sure, on historical grounds, that the 'Testament of Love' was the work of Thomas Usk, the "clericus familiaris" who betrayed his master, John of Northampton, and was beheaded in March, 1388. The agreement between the author's career, as he describes it, and the known career of Usk, is in itself almost decisive. I have hitherto abstained from publishing my view for various reasons, one of them being my inability to make anything of the acrostic. Now that the sentence is clear—"Margaret of virtue, have mercy on thine Usk"—I venture to say definitely that the 'Testament of Love' was written by Thomas Usk in the year 1387.

It is well known that the 'Testament' contains a florid compliment to Chaucer, somewhat awkwardly dragged in, and I think it is probable that the author hoped to secure the poet's intercession for him in his dire need. Very possibly Usk may have sent a copy of his work to Chaucer, and the MS., being found among Chaucer's papers, may have come down to Thynne with exceptionally good evidences of genuineness as one of the poet's own works. We may be pretty sure that Usk's praise occasioned Chaucer much more embarrassment than pleasure. Perhaps it is not too fanciful to suggest that when, two or three years after Usk's death, Gower playfully exhorted Chaucer to make his 'Testament of Love,' he was partly quizzing the poet about his disreputable admirer.

SALES.

The first sale of ex-libris was held by Messrs. Puttick & Simpson on January 28th, and excited great interest among collectors. The attendance was very large, and included many members of the Ex-Libris Society. Prices ruled high, the following being a selection of the more important lots:—Thomas Penn, "First Proprietor of Pennsylvania" (son of William Penn), 6*l.* William Hogarth, 1*l.* 10*s.* John Holland, engraved by Hogarth, 4*l.* George I. Gift Plates (2), 2*l.* 4*s.* Emmanuel College, Cambridge, 1*l.* 12*s.* Sir John Aubrey, 3*l.* 12*s.* 6*d.* Walpole Family (7), 3*l.* 12*s.* Rev. W. Barrow, 1*l.* Sir F. Cunliffe, by Bartolozzi, 1*l.* 6*s.* Dr. A. C(harlett), 1*l.* 18*s.* David Garrick, 1*l.* 18*s.* Sir Francis Fust, 1*l.* 10*s.* A. Lumisden, 1*l.* 10*s.* Joseph Smith, 1*l.* 10*s.* G. van Hamme, 1*l.* 4*s.* Harvard College, N.E., 1650, 3*l.* 5*s.* Sir Charles Frederick, 3*l.* 5*s.* H. Mill and C. Mill (7), 2*l.* 6*s.* Sir F. Leighton, &c. (20), 1*l.* 11*s.* Sir P. Sydenham (4), 1*l.* 7*s.* Trinity College, Dublin, Presentation Plates (35), 3*l.* 3*s.* Hon. Mistris Primerose (damaged), 15*s.* Elliker Bradshaw, 1*l.* 12*s.* C. Lennox, Duke of Richmond, 1*l.* 4*s.* Thomas Parker, 1704, 1*l.* 1*s.* Winchester College, 1*l.* 2*s.* The total realized by 295 lots, which included a few pieces of armorial china, was 246*l.*

On Friday, January 29th, and Monday, February 1st, Messrs. Puttick & Simpson sold the library of a gentleman removed from Kent and other properties, the following being some of the more important prices:—Gray's Elegy wrote in a Country Churchyard, first edition, 74*l.* 10*s.* Chertsey Worthies' Library, 14 vols., 9*l.* Horsfield's Sussex, 3*l.* History of the Wemyss Family, 17*l.* 10*s.* Discoveries at Halicarnassus, 5*l.* 10*s.* Burton's Arabian Nights, 29*l.* Walton's Angler, Pickering, 7*l.* Chronicles and Memorials, 75 vols., 8*l.* 10*s.* Salvin and Brodrick's Falconry, 6*l.* 6*s.* Hall's Poems, 1646, 3*l.* 7*s.* 6*d.* Autograph Letters: Nelson (2), 4*l.* 12*s.* 6*d.*; Tennyson, 2*l.*; Sir W. Scott, 2*l.* 2*s.*; G. Meredith, 1*l.* 10*s.*; George Eliot, 4*l.* 4*s.*; B. Franklin, 2*l.* 17*s.* 6*d.*; Mrs. Browning (2), 6*l.* 1*s.*

The first edition of Gray's Elegy, published at sixpence by R. Dodsley in 1751, is one of the most conspicuous items in the desiderata of the eighteenth century collector. The plain margin of the title in the copy sold was slightly cut. A copy was sold by Messrs. Sotheby in December, 1893. Mr. Foote's copy fetched at New York, in January, 1895, 270 dollars. It is interesting to note that the second, third, fourth, and fifth editions, all of which bear the date of the first issue, are only worth from 1*l.* 10*s.* to three guineas each.

'THE MIRROR OF JUSTICES.'

Prof. Maitland's brilliant and original criticism of the fourteenth century law-book known as 'The Mirror of Justices,' and attributed to Andrew Horn, has recently been discussed in certain learned periodicals, and exception has been taken in a most emphatic manner to the suggested view of this curious compilation as an elaborate mediæval hoax practised upon a wholly unsophisticated age by a not very intelligent forger, from an interested motive which has been clearly revealed to us in a kindred case by the learned researches of Prof. F. Liebermann.

As the above exception seems to be partly based upon the unseemliness of this irreverent proposition, it may be interesting to know that, quite independently of Prof. Maitland's arguments, even stronger language was used at the expense of the reputed author of 'The Mirror' as far back as the year 1703 by a grave English scholar, the contemporary of Madox and of the ponderously learned school of mediæval commentators, none of whom can fairly be credited with an undue sprightliness of style. This was George Hickes, the giant of the Northern school of Diplomatic, whose learned judgment has perhaps more rarely been reversed than that of any other English historical scholar. In the 'Dissertatio Epistolaris' appended to his 'Thesaurus,' Hickes alludes to the reputed author of 'The Mirror' in the following terms: "Quamobrem .....inter falsarios seculi, qui commenta sua orbi obtruserunt, ut Hornum vestrum numerandum existimem.....qui fabulam commentus est, generali nomine tutus dicit." Again, "Hornus 'Speculum' fallax suum dicitur scripsisse." Of one of his statements we read: "non potest non esse fictitium"; and, generally, "multa fabulosa et fictitia tradit." But the chief interest attaching to Hickes's criticism lies in his comparison of Horn's method with that employed by two other notable forgers, the abbots of Croyland and Bury. He treats their pretensions with ridicule—a ridicule which seems rather ponderous in its eighteenth century Latin garb, but against which no one has hitherto offered any protest.

Dealing with Ingulf, "falsarius aliquis Horno non absimilis," Hickes leaves it an open question whether he was a mere forger or a practical joker taking liberties ("more phantastico") with an unsophisticated age ("seculum indoctum"); whilst of a companion forger at Exeter he exclaims: "nescio majori an impudentiâ an imperitiâ."

As to the Bury forgeries, Hickes concludes a sarcastic comparison of commenta such as these and those of Horn and Ingulf with another pleasantry: "Inter historiolas illas digna omnino est quæ recenseatur fabula illa de Sancto Edmundo rege"—whose body, despite of arrows, javelins, blows, and finally decapitation, is related to have been found intact in his tomb.

Future editors of the Croyland and Bury histories should not fail to take note both of Prof. Maitland's and of Hickes's theories, which quite unconsciously support each other.

Literary Gossip.

Vol. III. of the "Centenary Burns," edited by Messrs. Henley and Henderson, will be published in the course of the next few days. We understand that the examination of old Scots MSS., black-letter broadsides, chapbooks, song-books, and the like has been much more fruitful than was expected; and that much new light has been cast on Burns's relation to popular song.

A collection of the 'Essays, Addresses, and Translations,' in three volumes, of the late Earl of Carnarvon, edited by Sir Robert Herbert, has been privately printed by the Dowager Countess of Carnarvon for distribution among her late husband's friends and relations.

Prof. Forrest, Director of the Indian Records, is bringing out a monograph on the 'Famine in India,' based on papers written by him in 1877 and sundry articles of recent date.

The Hon. W. Warren Vernon has in the press a second edition of his 'Readings on the Purgatorio,' which has been rewritten so as practically to form an entirely new work.

Under the title 'Religious Education in Secondary Schools: Suggestions for Teachers and Parents,' Messrs. Macmillan & Co. will shortly publish for the Rev. G. C. Bell, Head Master of Marlborough College, a small volume which it is hoped may help to place this important subject on a more satisfactory footing. Mr. Bell's suggestions are partly for the rearrangement of the material now used in teaching, partly for the inclusion of subjects commonly neglected, the aim being to bring into more prominence the vital elements of the Bible.

Messrs. J. Nisbet & Co. will publish this month a volume of letters from Mr. and Mrs. Rendel Harris, who have been for some months travelling through Armenia, witnessing the disturbances and distributing relief. Mr. Gladstone has contributed a short introductory note, recommending the publication of the letters.

For the "Literatures of the World" series, which Mr. Gosse is editing for Mr. Heinemann, Dr. Zoltán Beöthy, the most accomplished living historian and critic of Magyar literature, has undertaken to write the Hungarian volume.

Mr. Herbert A. Giles, late H.M. Consul at Ningpo, has finished 'A Chinese Biographical Dictionary.' It will contain about 2,500 lives of the most eminent Chinese statesmen, warriors, philosophers, poets, painters, travellers, priests, rebels, beauties, &c., from the earliest ages down to the present day. Biographical notices of the emperors will also be included.

Dr. E. Moore, as Barlow Lecturer on Dante, will deliver two lectures on 'Dante as a Religious Teacher, especially in Reference to Catholic Doctrine,' at University College, Gower Street, at 3 p.m. on Wednesday and Thursday next.

Francis, Count Lützow, of Zampach, in Bohemia, whose 'History of Bohemia' was published last year by Messrs. Chapman & Hall, is the author of a paper in the current number of the New Review on Bohemian poetry. The list of contents wrongly describes him as Frederick, Count Lützow.

We have to record, with regret, the death of Mr. Charles Roberts, who was for some years Secretary of the Public Record Office, but retired from the public service as long ago as the year 1866. Mr. Roberts was appointed in 1820 a clerk in the Record Office at the Tower by Mr. Petrie, then Keeper. He was a contemporary and friend of the late Sir T. D. Hardy, and was promoted to be an Assistant Keeper of Records in 1851. Mr. Roberts took an active part in the transfer of the contents of the metropolitan Record Offices to the new repository, and in 1854 he made a prolonged inspection of the records of the abolished Courts of the Principality of Wales with a view to their removal to London. In 1857 Mr. Roberts succeeded Mr. F. S. Thomas as Secretary of the Public Record Office, and he retired at the age of sixty-three in 1866, after more than forty-six years' service. It will be seen, therefore, that he was ninety-four years of age at the time of his death. Mr. Roberts was the editor of the two volumes of 'Fine Rolls,' produced under the supervision of the old Record Commission in 1835–6, and he was the author of the 'Calendarium Genealogicum,' published in 1865, a work which is still extensively used by record searchers.

The valuable foundation of Sir John Cass, which has not only been well nursed, but has also increased its income by the normal development of City properties, will hereafter provide a larger amount from its annual surplus for the needs of the Hackney Institute, which will acknowledge the benefaction by assuming the name of the original founder.

Mr. J. C. Nimmo will publish shortly a new illustrated and revised edition of the Rev. S. Baring-Gould's 'Lives of the Saints.' Additional lives of English martyrs and Cornish and Welsh saints will be given, and the edition will contain a calendar of saints for every day in the year, and about twenty-three hundred biographies, over four hundred engravings, and a full index to the entire work. It will be issued in monthly volumes and at a popular price.

Mr. Nimmo also informs us he has acquired the copyright of all the works written by the late Miss Manning, author of 'The Household of Sir Thomas More,' 'Cherry and Violet,' &c. Miss Manning's various books numbered some fifty in all; the more interesting of these will be published uniform with the illustrated edition of 'The Household of Sir Thomas More' recently issued by Mr. Nimmo.

We are glad to see that the Newsvendors' Benevolent Institution intends to commemorate the present jubilee of the Queen's reign by placing the entire donations received during the year to the Royal Victoria Pension Fund, inaugurated by the Queen in 1887, for the benefit of the widows of newsvendors. The festival will be held soon after Easter, and Lord Crewe has kindly consented to preside.

Mr. F. Allen writes from St. Neots :—

"Some of the readers of the review in the Athenæum of January 23rd of Mr. Almack's book may be glad to know what was the price of the early edition. I have in my hands two copies of the 'Povrtraictvre of His Sacred Majestie in his Solitudes and Sufferings,' both dated 1648, therefore less than two months after the death of the king. One, which appears by the error in the pagination (the numbers 145 to 154 being repeated) to be the earliest issue, has on the fly-leaf 'Katherine Bowyer, her booke, March 22nd, 1649/50—cost 1*s.* 6*d.*'"

Under the title 'Letters from the Sudan,' Messrs. Macmillan & Co. will publish an account of the recent expedition to Dongola based upon the letters of the special correspondent of the Times, Mr. E. F. Knight, the well-known author of 'The Cruise of the Falcon.'

We regret to hear that the Committee of the Guildhall Library has declined to place a bust of the late Mr. Joseph Whitaker in its precincts.

Messrs. Longman announce a series of volumes by various hands, which will deal with matters of practical theology, under the title of "The Oxford Library of Practical Theology," and will be edited by Canon Newbolt and the Rev. F. E. Brightman, of the Pusey House, Oxford.

Messrs. Patrick Geddes, of Edinburgh, are about to reissue the several tales comprised in Miss Fiona Macleod's two volumes of Celtic tales, 'The Sin-Eater' and 'The Washer of the Ford,' entirely rearranged and organically grouped. Several stories which have not hitherto appeared are to be printed. The whole will fill three volumes, divided into 'Spiritual Tales,' 'Barbaric Tales,' and 'Tragic Romances.' Among the additions will be the long story entitled 'Morag of the Glen,' which was published some time ago in an English magazine, but, as just mentioned, most of the additional matter is new.

The Russian Imperial Academy has decided to undertake the publication of a national biographical dictionary of Russian men of letters and men of science. The ground for such a work had been prepared by the laborious efforts of M. Venguérov, and the materials he provides will practically form the work, which the Academy will bring out at its own cost. It is stated that these materials fill 400,000 pages of manuscript, and contain a biographical sketch of the selected individuals as well as references to their works. Living Russians are included, and M. Venguérov has received much assistance from them in his compilation.

On April 24th the University Court of Wales will, it is expected, decide the much vexed question—important, at any rate, to Welshmen—as to the location of the central offices of the University.

Dr. Karl Holsten, Professor of Exegetical Theology at the University of Heidelberg, died in that town on January 27th, in his seventy-first year. He was a native of Mecklenburg, and studied philology and theology at Rostock, Leipzig, and Berlin. In 1852 he became a teacher at the Gymnasium in Rostock, where he published in 1868 his treatise 'Zum Evangelium des Paulus und Petrus.' The fame of this work brought him an invitation to a professorship in the University of Berne, and in 1876 he was called to Heidelberg, and remained there until his death. His loss will be keenly felt, not only in the theological faculty, but throughout liberal ecclesiastical circles in Baden. His lectures were attended not only by his own devoted troop of students, but by hearers belonging to other classes. He published several critical works upon the Gospels, and was a contributor to the Jahrbücher für protestantische Theologie, but the most influential of his writings was the 'Ursprung und Wesen der Religion.'

The extraordinarily productive novelist Ernst Konrad Ziletmann, whose pseudonym was "Konrad Telmann," died a few days ago. He was born at Stettin in 1854, and studied law at Leipzig, Berlin, Heidelberg, and Greifswald, and for a few years practised in his native land. In addition to his novels and romances, of which there are about fifty volumes, he translated Goldoni, Giacosa, and other Italian writers into German, and published a few volumes of lyrical verse. In 1891 he married Hermine von Preuschen, herself an author as well as a painter of some note.

The Parliamentary Papers of the week include a List of Buildings of Architectural and Historical Interest, of which the Structure and Fabric are maintained by the Admiralty (1*d.*); Calendar and Summary of Regulations of the Science and Art Department, 1897 (1*s.* 7*d.*); and a Return of the Charities of the Parish of Badsworth, Yorkshire (2*d.*).

SCIENCE

BIOLOGICAL LITERATURE.

An Atlas of Nerve Cells, by M. Allen Starr, M.D. (Macmillan & Co.), is a companion volume to the 'Atlas of Fertilization and Karyokinesis,' reviewed in these columns some time since. The two volumes have furnished a leading scientific contemporary with the text for sermons upon the photography of histological evidence—somewhat unnecessarily, as it appears to us. Most biologists will at once admit that no process of microphotography at present practised can be compared as evidence with a drawing made by a trained observer, which is produced as the composite result of the study of numerous preparations, made perhaps by various methods, and in which is the work not only of eye and hand, but of brain also. These atlases do not profess to supplant work of this kind. The object of the one before us is "to present to students and teachers of histology a series of photographs showing the appearance of the central nervous system as seen under the microscope." Practically no students and but few teachers of histology have the time or skill to make elaborate preparations of the entire central nervous system, least of all by the complicated and somewhat uncertain methods of Golgi; but with this atlas in the teacher's hand, and with a few characteristic preparations, any student can easily follow all the main features of the anatomy of the brain and spinal cord. We cannot but regard this as clear gain. The atlas contains chapters on the histological and photographic techniques employed, by Messrs. O. C. Strong and E. Leeming respectively; these are followed by fifty-three microphotographs and thirteen figures, with an explanatory text by Prof. Starr. The photographs (or the preparations) are, naturally enough, of unequal merit, but it is unnecessary to point out particular instances. The book should become an indispensable helper in all histological laboratories and medical schools.

The Biological Problem of To-day: Preformation or Epigenesis? By Prof. Oscar Hertwig. Authorized Translation by P. Chalmers Mitchell. (Heinemann.)—An odd and rather significant phenomenon of the last few years has been the rise of what is known as Weismannism. An esoteric theory, with little or no basis of fact, on a question of no previous interest to the general public, was suddenly found to have appealed strongly to what may be termed the "Magazine mind"—that section of the public which imagines itself to be kept abreast of current work and thought by reading what A has to say on B's views touching C's polemics against D's theory. That Girton would be agitated on the question was to be anticipated, but Weismann's dogmas cropped up in such unexpected places as Church Congresses, and one almost expected to hear one's partner at a dance lisp glibly of idants and determinants. Not since the publication of the 'Origin of Species' has the calm of the biological temple been so broken by profane clamour. At present less is heard on the matter, but it is reported that the question of the inheritance of acquired characters is still disturbing remote country book-clubs. Curiously enough, it is in England, and, to a less extent, America, rather than in Germany, that Weismann has found supporters, and we welcome, therefore, an English translation of Oscar Hertwig's demolition of a fascinating, but unsupported hypothesis. No one has devoted more time than the author to laborious investigation of the facts of cell morphology and development, and he has effectively given the misericorde to the germ plasm and its attendant "ids," "determinants," and "biophores." In its place he wisely offers a "conception" rather than a theory. The translation is spirited and interesting; the translator is responsible also for a well-written introduction, and for a glossary in which accuracy has been a little sacrificed to brevity.

Text-Book of Comparative Anatomy. By Dr. A. Lang. Translated by H. M. and M. Bernard. Part II. (Macmillan & Co.)—The second part of this treatise is altogether a more serious production than the first. The difference in scope may be gauged by the following facts. In the first part Protozoa, Porifera, Cœlenterata, "Vermes," and Arthropoda together filled only 545 pages; in this second volume 560 pages are devoted merely to Mollusca and Echinodermata, and, as the translators say, these two chapters "are in reality more like comprehensive treatises on the groups with which they deal" than items in an ordinary text-book. Prof. Lang's method is that of the severest comparative anatomy; ætiology and theoretical morphology are pleasantly neglected, and homological speculation confined within decent limits. The matter of the book is arranged by systems of organs, not by systematic groups of organisms—a defensible, but in our opinion regrettable, treatment. One thing is at least certain, that with this treatment an absolutely exhaustive index is required in order to enable the student readily to obtain a fact about any animal on which he may be at work. For example, Haliotis and the Haliotidæ are represented by five references in the index, but by seventeen important citations in the text. For the omissions, we presume, the translators are responsible, and for a large number of annoying misspellings (e.g., "Zeugobranchiata," "conchyolin," "Oncidium," "porcelanous," "hectocotilised," "Schiemenez"); but it is only fair to add here that they have achieved an adequate translation. The author has done his work well; both text and illustrations (mostly new to text-books, and often original) are excellent; and the thorny questions of chiastoneury and of the homologies of echinoderm plates are discreetly handled. The same figure is, unfortunately, made to do duty for the architypal mollusc (p. 26) and the architypal gastropod (p. 150), but surely Prof. Lang does not intend to convey the idea that the "Urmollusk" was a gastropod—the student's natural inference. Lankester's Archimollusc is much less compromising and more generalized; Lang's concept further lacks the shell-sac, an essential feature of molluscan ancestry. In addition to the Mollusca and Echinodermata, this volume describes what we in England class as Hemichordata, viz., Balanoglossus, Cephalodiscus, and Rhabdopleura, the affinities of which, according to Lang (and other German writers), lie rather with the echinoderms than the Chordata; the two views are, however, not irreconcilable. Embryology, as is best in a book of this kind, is only lightly sketched in by the description of a few leading types. We can only hope that Prof. Lang, and, we may add, his present translators, will produce a second edition of the first part which shall be worthy to place beside this present volume.

SOCIETIES.

Royal.—Jan. 28.—The President, followed by the Treasurer, in the chair.—Mr. J. Eliot and Dr. E. C. Stirling were admitted into the Society.—The following papers were read: 'On the Capacity and Residual Charge of Dielectrics as affected by Temperature and Time,' by Dr. Hopkinson and Mr. E. Wilson,—'On the Electrical Resistivity of Electrolytic Bismuth at Low Temperatures and in Magnetic Fields,' by Profs. Dewar and Fleming,—and 'On the Selective Conductivity exhibited by certain Polarizing Substances,' by Prof. J. C. Bose.

Geological.—Jan. 20.—Dr. H. Hicks, President, in the chair.—Messrs. A. R. Cragg, E. A. S. Fawcett, and J. Lomas were elected Fellows.—The following communications were read: 'On Glacial Phenomena of Palæozoic Age in the Varanger Fiord,' and 'The Raised Beaches and Glacial Deposits of the Varanger Fiord,' by Mr. A. Strahan.

Society of Antiquaries.—Jan. 28.—Viscount Dillon, V.P., in the chair.—The Rev. W. C. Streatfeild exhibited and presented a number of seals and illuminated pedigrees and other documents.—Mr. W. Rome exhibited a small white marble bust of Jupiter Serapis, of Greek work, found in Egypt.—Mr. F. Haverfield communicated a note on a Roman lamp of terra-cotta, and probably Christian, found at Bradfield, Berks, which was also exhibited.—Mr. H. Price exhibited some beautifully worked flint weapons, with crescent-shaped heads, from Luxor; also a remarkable terra-cotta object containing an Archimedean screw, perhaps a model of similar contrivances used for irrigation purposes, and worked by the feet in the manner of a treadmill.—Mr. J. R. Mortimer communicated a paper on a number of cruciform embankments in East Yorkshire, which he supposed to be the Christian successors of the circular mounds used for the assembly of the folk-moot.—It was, however, suggested in the discussion that followed that such embankments were more probably thrown up as shelters for sheep or cattle, the summits being planted with bushes or small trees to keep off the wind.

Linnean.—Jan. 21.—Mr. C. B. Clarke, V.P., in the chair.—Messrs. R. Barnes and F. G. Sinclair were admitted Fellows.—Dr. J. Lowe exhibited some fossil antlers of Cervus elaphus from Southern Fen, Cambridge. The dimensions given were: length along outside curve, right 42·6 in., left 41 in.; circumference above burr, right 11·6 in., left 11 in.; greatest inside width 37 in., at top 32·6 in. With these were also exhibited various fragments of implements and weapons which had been discovered in proximity, showing that the animal had lived contemporaneously with man.—Dr. H. O. Forbes referred to similar antlers of great size preserved in the Liverpool Museum, which had been discovered during the cutting of the Manchester Ship Canal.—Mr. J. E. Harting showed drawings of large antlers found at Bourne End in 1894 during the construction of the new viaduct over the Thames, and by a man ploughing at Boston, Lincolnshire, in 1895. It was remarkable that while the antlers of red deer at the present day showed a marked deterioration in size and weight when compared with those obtained in a fossil state in England, this was not the case with the roe deer.—Mr. H. Monckton exhibited specimens of a common freshwater mollusc, Limnæa peregra, collected by him at the Howietoun Ponds, Selkirkshire, showing a variation from the normal type in being more or less banded. The banding was in every case confined to the last whorl of the shell, and often to the outer portion of the whorl, although in one or two cases it was arrested before reaching the mouth of the shell. Mr. Monckton, after describing the position and nature of the ponds referred to, was inclined to attribute the variation in question to the abundance of food supplied for the Salmonidæ reared there, and to the absence of lime from the water.—Mr. B. B. Woodward exhibited a similar variation in shells of Limnæa stagnalis, wherein the banding was longitudinal—a peculiarity which had been recorded by Mr. T. D. Cockerell.—Sir J. Maitland gave the results of an analysis which had been made of the water at Howietoun and Craigend, with a view to determine the bearing it might have on the growth of fish and variation in the shells of the mollusca referred to.—The Secretary read a letter from Mr. J. Y. Johnson, of Funchal, commenting upon Dr. D. Morris's exhibition (November 5th) of raphides composed of oxalate of lime in the bulbs of hyacinths, the handling of which had produced a form of eczema. Mr. Johnson mentioned a parallel case in Richardia æthiopica, a beautiful aroid known to gardeners as the lily of the Nile. The laundresses at Funchal had tried to utilize the starch obtainable from the corms, but complained of the irritation in the hands produced by it, which on examination was found to result from the presence of numerous needle-shaped raphides, as in the case of the hyacinth bulbs referred to.—Dr. G. E. Smith read a paper 'On the Origin of the Corpus callosum: a Comparative Study of the Hippocampal Region of the Cerebrum of Marsupialia and certain Cheiroptera.' The author entered into a detailed comparison of the portion of the brain named in Perameles nasuta and Nyctophilus timoriensis, and showed that the latter presents one of the lowest known terms in the Eutherian series.—The paper was criticized by Dr. Mivart, Dr. Keith, Dr. Robinson, and Prof. Howes.—On behalf of Dr. J. Gilchrist a paper was read 'On the Minute Structure of the Nervous System of the Mollusca.'

Philological.—Jan. 29.—Prof. Skeat, V.P., in the chair.—The paper read was 'On the MSS., Metre, and Grammar of Chaucer's "Troilus,"' by Prof. McCormick. He made three editions of the poem, α, β, γ. The best representative of α was a poor Phillipps MS., No. 8252, but having a text nearer to Boccaccio than any other. The next was H2, Harleian 3943; this goes up to IV. 196, and then shifts. The third was H. 2392, which is α from Book I. to Book III. 231. The fourth was the Cambridge Gg, from α after l. 113 of Book II. The fifth was H5, or Harl. 4912, a copy of the Cambridge Gg though with variations. The sixth was St. John's Cambridge, from II. 1161 to III. 427, and from IV. 400 to the end of IV. Ed. β (probably the first complete transcript of the poem) contains H2, or Harl. 3943, from IV. 197 to the end; H4 from IV. 232 to the end; Gg and H5 from I. to II. 112; St. John's from I. 1 to II. 163, and III. 427 to IV. 400. Rawlinson MS. is the type of β, and Caxton too (after collation with γ), and H3 from I. to II. 1033. Ed. γ contains three MSS.—Corpus, Campsall, and H1, or Harleian 2280 (the best MSS. for spelling, &c.; Digby and Selden 2 are very poor). Addit. and Durham are close transcripts of one original, with changes from β. H3, No. 2, from II. 1034 to III. 231, is from the original of the Corpus group. H3, No. 3, from III. 230 to the end has readings of all the types; from IV. 318 to end of IV. it is α consistently. Selden B24, an excellent MS., though in Scotch, from I. to II. 516, is close to γ; and then is in the main β and H3, No. 3. Thynne's MS. began with Caxton and an earlier book, and then merely follows γ. The order of α, β, γ, is settled by their nearness to the Boccaccio; but even the Phillipps fails in Book IV. Probably the copies were made before Chaucer had finished the work. Of the changes from Boccaccio and α, some are Chaucer's and deliberate, others are due to later corrections made, without fresh reference to the Italian original, either by Chaucer or some good scholar; but of those in γ none can be absolutely traced to Chaucer. Though the MSS. of α and β are very bad, Prof. McCormick has based his text on the best of them, the John's at Cambridge, correcting it by the other MSS. of α and β, and giving collations of the γ group. This text will appear in Macmillan's 'Chaucer,' of which Mr. A. W. Pollard is the general editor, and in which he has already issued the 'Canterbury Tales' from the Ellesmere MS. The prose 'Boece' and 'Astrolabe' are to be edited by Mr. M. H. Liddell.

Institution of Civil Engineers.—Feb. 2.—Mr. J. W. Barry, President, in the chair.—It was announced that seven Associate Members had been transferred to the class of Members, and that seventeen candidates had been admitted as Students.—The monthly ballot resulted in the election of five Members, of thirty-six Associate Members, and of Vice-Admiral Sir G. S. Nares as an Associate.

Royal Institution.—Feb. 1.—Sir J. Crichton-Browne, Treas and V.P., in the chair.—The following were elected Members: Mr. A. L. Cohen, Mrs. Delaforce, Sir C. A. Elliott, Mr. J. L. Johnston, Dr. A. Liebmann, Mr. T. G. Longstaff, Mr. H. Marsh, the Rev. E. G. C. Parr, Mr. C. Rose, and Mr. E. P. Thompson.

Society of Arts.—Feb. 1.—Mr. W. Burton delivered the third lecture of his course of Cantor Lectures 'On Material and Design in Pottery,' the subject of the lecture being mainly that of stonewares.

Feb. 2.—The Earl of Jersey in the chair.—A paper 'On the Progress of the British Colonial Empire during the Sixty Years of Her Majesty's Reign' was read before the Foreign and Colonial Section by the Right Hon. Sir C. W. Dilke, Bart., M.P.—A discussion followed.

Feb. 3.—The Right Hon. J. Bryce in the chair.—A paper 'On the Recess Committee and its Recommendations for the Development of Ireland's Agricultural and Industrial Resources' was read by the Right Hon. H. Plunkett, M.P., Chairman of the Recess Committee.—A discussion followed.

Society of Engineers.—Feb. 1.—Mr. S. H. Cox, late President, occupied the chair, and presented the premiums awarded for papers read during 1896.—Mr. G. M. Lawford, President, then took the chair, and delivered his inaugural address.

Society of Biblical Archæology.—Feb. 2.—Sir P. le Page Renouf, President, in the chair.—A paper was read by the Rev. C. J. Ball, 'The Prophecy of the Servant' (Isa. lii., liii.).

MEETINGS FOR THE ENSUING WEEK.

Mon. London Institution, 5.—'Decorative Bookbinding from Mediæval Times,' Mr. C. J. Davenport.
— Aristotelian, 8.—'Self-Realization,' Mr. H. Sturt.
— Society of Arts, 8.—'Material and Design in Pottery,' Lecture IV., Mr. W. Burton (Cantor Lecture).
— Surveyors' Institution, 8.—'Allotments and Small Holdings,' Mr. J. W. W. Bund.
— Geographical, 8½.
Tues. Royal Institution, 3.—'Animal Electricity,' Prof. A. D. Waller.
— Society of Arts, 8.—'Lithography as a Mode of Artistic Expression,' Mr. G. McCulloch.
— Civil Engineers, 8.—'Cold Storage at the London and India Docks,' Mr. H. F. Donaldson.
Wed. United Service Institution, 8.—'The Militia,' Lieut.-Col. Lord Raglan.
— Society of Arts, 8.—'The Chemistry of Tea,' Mr. D. Crole.
Thurs. Royal Institution, 3.—'The Problems of Arctic Geology,' Dr. J. W. Gregory.
— Royal, 4½.
— Society of Arts, 4½.—'The Progress of Science Teaching in India,' Prof. Jagadis Chundra Bose.
— London Institution, 6.—'Italian, French, and German Music of the Sixteenth, Seventeenth, and Eighteenth Centuries,' Mr. A. Dolmetsch.
— Society of Arts, 8.—'The Mechanical Production of Cold,' Lecture III., Prof. J. A. Ewing (Howard Lecture).
— Electrical Engineers, 8.—Discussion on 'Electric Interlocking the Block and Mechanical Signals on Railways.'
— Mathematical, 8.

Thurs. Antiquaries 8½.—'A Double Mazer mounted in Silver-Gilt,' Sir J. C. Robinson; Report as Local Secretary for Cumberland, Chancellor Ferguson; 'The Secrets of Alexis,' Prof. J. Ferguson.
Fri. Astronomical 5.—Anniversary Meeting.
— Philological 8.—'Notes on the Ulster English Dialect,' Mr. J. H. Starkie.
— Civil Engineers 8.—'Cooling Reservoirs for Condensing Engines,' Mr. H. W. Barker; 'Students' Meeting.'
— Royal Institution, 9.—Recent Advances in Seismology, Prof. J. Milne.
Sat. Royal Institution 3.—'The Growth of the Mediterranean Route to the East,' Mr. W. J. Lord.

Science Gossip.

It is proposed to endow the electrical laboratory of University College, London, as part of a scheme to perpetuate the memory of the late Sir John Pender.

Lady Prestwich is collecting materials for a memoir of the late Sir Joseph Prestwich, and will be glad of letters of his. Such will be copied speedily and returned. Lady Prestwich's address is Darent Hulme, Shoreham, near Sevenoaks, Kent.

A telegram from the Lowell Observatory, which is now placed near the city of Mexico, announces that a rift has been observed from the 7th ult. in the north polar cap of Mars, in longitude 40°. This is probably a similar phenomenon to those which were observed in the southern cap during the opposition of 1894, indicating the uncovering of the lower levels near the poles as the snow melts, whilst it still remains on the higher elevations.

A new observatory is about to be established at Rössgen, Saxony. It will be provided with a refractor of 6·8 inches aperture, with both visual and photographic objectives, and be placed under the direction of Dr. F. Krüger, formerly of the Kiel, and afterwards of the Bamberg observatory. The special plan of work is to be the formation of a photometric catalogue of coloured stars, photometric determination of stars, and the construction of star-charts, by the aid of photography, of regions of the sky containing variables.

A report presented to the Geological Section of the British Association, drawn up by Mr. Clement Reid as secretary of a committee of which Sir John Evans was chairman, is important from an anthropological point of view as relating to excavations made, for the purpose of determining the relation of palæolithic man to the glacial epoch, at Hoxne, in Norfolk, the classic ground in which Mr. John Frere found palæolithic implements as early as the year 1797. The committee arrive with clearness at the conclusion that the palæolithic implements of Hoxne are much later than the boulder clay of that district, in which Arctic conditions are indicated, and that the palæolithic deposits are, indeed, separated from it by two climatic waves, with corresponding changes of the flora. They point out that this does not affect the possibility that man may have lived in the district in earlier times, though no implements have been discovered in the earlier beds, or that palæolithic man may have been interglacial or preglacial in other districts; but in that case the identity of form of the implements would be a difficulty to be solved.

FINE ARTS

Letters, Archæological and Historical, relating to the Isle of Wight. By E. Boucher James. 2 vols. (Oxford, Clarendon Press.)

This memorial edition, as it might be termed, of the late Vicar of Carisbrooke's contributions to the Isle of Wight County Press is given to the world by his widow. It is to the attractive personality of their writer that they owe their chief interest. Mr. James had been connected with Queen's, Oxford, for twenty years before he was presented by that college to the living of Carisbrooke, and his life at Oxford, in the course of which he held office in the University as well as in his college, has left its stamp upon his work. In the mixed system of patronage which exists in the Church of England, college livings, if sometimes liable, like others, to abuse, justify their existence in such cases as that of Mr. James. We speak not merely of the studious habits and the ripe learning that such men bring to the Church, but of that freedom from caste feeling and ecclesiastical prejudice which is found at times in those who from the first have been engaged in parochial work. For if we were to summarize the characteristics of these two volumes we should find them, on the one hand in the fact that Mr. James wrote always as a scholar and a gentleman (to employ a phrase he might himself have used), and on the other in a broad-minded toleration which led him always to note what was most worthy of praise in those who were not of his own communion. As his brother-in-law, Mr. Justice Charles, observes in a brief prefatory sketch, "he belonged to no party in the Church." It would be difficult to find a writer more scrupulously fair.

Turning from the man to his 'Letters,' one must warn the reader at the outset that they are not of the character of original contributions, either to history or archæology. Appearing in the columns of a local newspaper, and avowedly possessing a "colloquial and informal character," their contents are derived, to a large extent, from sources as familiar as Macaulay's history, or as accessible as the Oglander memoirs. Mr. James, doubtless, never contemplated their preservation in more permanent form; and, indeed, they have had, for this edition, to be rearranged in chronological order, the best system under the circumstances, but one which, it is admitted, leads to occasional repetition. Although, as he loved to say himself, an "overer," Mr. James became keenly interested in the island and its history, so that, from its earliest inhabitants and the origin of its local names down to events in the present century, nothing came amiss to his pen. But it was naturally in Carisbrooke that his interest centred, and it must have been to him peculiarly gratifying that the excavations for the vicarage he built there brought to light a Roman villa. There was the castle also, with all its memories of the imprisonment of Charles I. and of past governors of the island; and, above all, there was the church itself, one of that "divided" type in which his friend Freeman delighted, giving scope for anxious speculation as to when its chancel had been pulled down, and by whom. In that church he had for his predecessor under the Commonwealth Alexander Ross, the Presbyterian, whose ponderous tomes were immortalized in 'Hudibras'; and, best of all, he was called upon to preach from a real "Puritan pulpit," erected in 1658, and spared, strange to say, by the vandal hand of the "restorer." One cannot wonder that Dean Stanley, preaching at the reopening of the church, alluded to this striking witness of the past, one of those which the true archæologist desires to preserve in the national Church as a part of the national history.

It is owing, perhaps, to these associations that the vicar recurred again and again to that strange period of the Puritan domination, which the clergy usually prefer to ignore, but in which he took a keen interest. Yet it curiously illustrates the difficulty that an Anglican clergyman finds in conceiving a national Church differing in its doctrines from his own, that while insisting that "the Church itself was neither disestablished nor disendowed," he could yet write in another place that "the national Church was disestablished and disendowed," and could even assert elsewhere that, from 1645 to 1660,

"the Church had no existence, except in the persons of scattered and oppressed members, who still clung to their proscribed faith and liturgy. The Church of the Puritans succeeded to the silenced Church of England,.....and for fifteen years Puritanism as the established religion of England was supreme."

The fact is that, as he admits, the nation did not break off "the ancient connexion between Church and State," but the national Church, or Church of England (as it still styled itself), became for the time Presbyterian or Puritan (whichever term is preferred), just as at the Reformation it changed, to whatever extent, its doctrines. But Anglicans, while insisting on its continuity, as the national Church, at the Reformation, are unable to grasp its similar continuity a century later. Yet even here the author's fairness is seen in his vindication of the Puritan clergy as a whole from the charge of illiteracy and low origin.

Among the curious out-of-the-way subjects on which these letters touch is the appearance among the island saints of a St. Urian, who seems traceable to the diocese of Évreux, and thence to Brittany rather than to any Celtic survival in this country. In his papers on Quarr Abbey, the most important religious house in the island, Mr. James ventured to correct Dugdale as to its connexion with Savigny; but he was mistaken. The house was not, as he imagined, really Cistercian till the "Order of Savigny" made over its English houses to Cîteaux. We may say, in conclusion, that these volumes will be indispensable to all those who are interested in the history of the island, as containing information industriously collected from scattered sources. We have no doubt that, at the time of their appearance, these letters did excellent work in quickening local interest in their subject.

Of the Decorative Illustration of Books Old and New. By Walter Crane. (Bell & Sons.)—Mr. Crane mentions that his book owes its origin to the three Cantor Lectures which he delivered before the Society of Arts in 1889; and though its development has been spread over seven years it retains traces of its source in a good deal of rhetoric, which seems a little superfluous and unbusinesslike now that it comes to be read instead of heard. The worst fault, indeed, of his book is that it conveys so little information. A few rather disconnected remarks on illuminated manuscripts, a few more on early printed books, some appreciative criticism of the book illustrators of our own day, and an abundance of pretty pictures—these are the contributions to his subject which Mr. Crane's work offers, and they are hardly satisfying. The author's good taste keeps him right in the remarks he makes about individual books, whether in print or manuscript; but he never traces out the characteristics of a school or comes to close quarters with his subject. Even his pictures, pretty as they are, and, on the whole, very well reproduced, fail in any real sense to illustrate his book. This is, no doubt, partly due to the perversity with which, especially in the first fifty or sixty pages, they are scattered meaninglessly over a text with which they have nothing to do. But even if this were not so, the failure would remain; for the whole point of Mr. Crane's book, and the distinctive difference which separates it from Mr. Pennell's volume on 'Modern Illustrations,' also published in the "Ex-libris Series," is practically ignored. To quote Mr. Crane's own words, "purely graphic design, as such, unrelated to the type and the conditions of the page," does not come within his scope. Elsewhere, following Mr. Morris, he rightly substitutes the double page which a book presents when it is opened as the unit into which the picture has to be introduced in decorative harmony; but, unless we are mistaken, this unit is only shown complete in one of his illustrations, and there it is spoilt by the two pages not being accurately adjusted. Title-pages, of course, do not suffer so badly from this treatment; but to reproduce woodcuts divorced from the type with which they were designed to harmonize, and often reduced and inserted into a page quite different in character, is surely a violation of the very theory which Mr. Crane upholds. Nothing is more interesting in the study of early illustrated books of the best period than to mark how differences in the character of the type are almost invariably accompanied by differences in the technique of the woodcuts. Mr. Crane is by no means ignorant of all this; but he has taken no pains to illustrate it, and his work is thus rather an eclectic anthology of pretty pictures with sympathetic comments than a serious treatise.

M. Calmann Lévy publishes the Souvenirs: L'Enfance, of the painter Munkacsy, with what is described as a "preface" by M. Boyer d'Agen, and with a most striking and characteristic photograph of the painter. The so-called preface fills sixty-seven pages of the little volume, and is an unmeasured panegyric on the Hungarian painter. The recollections of childhood of the author himself are slight, and not of any considerable interest.

NEW PRINTS.

The artist's proof on vellum, one of a hundred and fifty (inclusive of a few on Japanese paper), which we have received from Messrs. Obach & Co., is taken from a plate, etched by Heer P. J. Arendzen, after Frank Hals's famous life-size, nearly three-quarters-length portrait of 'A Dutch Cavalier,' which is now at Hertford House. We congratulate the etcher on having achieved an extraordinary success in translating his original quite perfectly, and reproducing its firm and perfect draughtsmanship and Hals's massive and emphatic touch, which, without parting with the lucidity of oil-paint, imparts to his works the "squareness" of mosaics. Nor has he failed to render the brilliance of the picture, its breadth and simplicity, nor omitted any of the delicate embroideries and laces the cavalier adorned himself with. The original, as 'The Laughing Cavalier,' was No. 75 at the Academy in 1888. It is inscribed, "Æta. Suæ 26 A°. 1624." The date shows that the work belongs to the best period of Hals's art.

Mr. Lefèvre has sent us an artist's proof of Mr. J. C. Webb's plate in mezzotint after Mr. John Charlton's large picture 'The Lost Fox,' a hunting scene in a wood, where a party of riders ask a countryman, "Which way has he gone?" This excellent and careful print does justice to its original, especially to the horses and the charming figure of the mounted lady on our left, and is intended as a companion to 'The Poisoned Hound,' engraved after another work of Mr. Charlton.—Messrs. Frost & Reed send us an artist's proof of Mr. Scrimshire's plate 'The Ferry,' after Mr. E. M. Wimperis's picture, representing a rapid stream in a flat country, with a church, trees, and a farmhouse on one bank, a party disembarking on the other, and overhead a heavy storm impending. The print is a little sooty, but otherwise just to the picture, though the engraver's touch is heavy.

Mr. Rowland Ward has sent us an artist's proof of a mezzotint by M. E. Wehrschmidt, after the portrait by Mr. Lowes Dickinson of Mr. F. C. Selous. It was executed during Mr. Selous's visit to England in 1885, and presented to Rugby School by the late Tom Hughes. As is always the case with Mr. Dickinson's portraits, the picture is an undeniable likeness, well and solidly painted. The traveller stands in full light fronting us; he wears a brown felt hat on his head, and his right hand grasps the barrel of his rifle. Characteristically, he wears no shirt collar; the shirt is open at the neck, and the coat hangs loose on the shoulders. All Mr. Selous's admirers ought to be grateful to Mr. Dickinson for this portrait.

Rossetti, a good likeness-taker, and, when he chose to do his best, a beautiful draughtsman, engaged Browning to sit to him in 1855, when their friendship was still in its first glow after he had discovered the author of 'Pauline,' and listened to those enchantments of 'Bells and Pomegranates' which had so prodigious an influence upon him and the inner circle of his friends. The portrait which he took on this occasion is a head only in three-quarters view to our right, with the eyes in the same direction and the lips slightly set. It is bright in colour, clear and pure in its tonality on a green ground, and it measures 4 in. by nearly 5 in.; it hung in the painter's studio until his death. It is now in the possession of Mr. C. Fairfax Murray. Of this noteworthy work the Autotype Company has sent us an autogravure reproduction, of the same size, and, except that it is a little dark, a very desirable version.

From the Berlin Photographic Company we have a second instalment of those admirable reproductions from pictures at the Hermitage, St. Petersburg, the first group of which we have already noticed. As transcripts, those now before us surpass their forerunners, and we know no version of that masterpiece 'The Jewish Bride' of Rembrandt (No. 812), etched, engraved, or otherwise made, which approaches the one now before us. Indeed only the obscurity of the darker masses mars the fidelity of the rendering of the gladness of the girl's features, the modelling of her hands, the lucidity of the tones of her dress, and the wonderfully finished embroideries upon it. Almost as welcome is the portrait of Jeremias de Decker (827) in a tall Dutch hat, which casts a shadow with its broad rim upon his upper features, but leaves such wealth of light upon his cheek and nose as only Rembrandt ever painted. This transcript gives an admirable idea of Rembrandt's insight into his sitters, his searching, though recondite sense of humour, and his incomparable technique. The 'Portrait of Sobieski' (?), which is No. 811 in the Hermitage, represents to the life the truculent worthy, also in a fur coat and lofty cap, who stares defiantly at succeeding generations. Rembrandt's 'Meeting of David and Absolom' (1777)—both of them dressed in Turkish garments, with a Romanesque cathedral in the background!—barring the darkness we have mentioned, is quite a wonder in its way. When Rubens painted the 'Meeting of Perseus and Andromeda' (552) he introduced a most magnificent Pegasus, a piebald charger. The reproduction is so complete that the hatching with opaque pigments of Rubens's brush over the thin under-paint is easily seen and understood, while the modelling and the drawing leave nothing to be desired, from the sweeping touches used in delineating Pegasus's near hoof to the treatment (one of the most scientific examples of forthright handling that we know of) of the steed's expanded wings and flowing mane. Even the marks of corrected outlines are discoverable throughout, and another good point is the exact reproduction of the soft brilliance of the carnations of the somewhat obese Andromeda. Almost as good in the last-named particular is the flesh of the Child in Rubens's 'Madonna and Child' (1794). Finally, the print before us of Van Dyck's 'Susanna Fourment and her Daughter Catherine' (635) deserves high praise. This is the famous group from the Choiseul Gallery, formerly, but wrongly, supposed to represent Helena Fourment, the second wife of Rubens, a niece of Isabella Brandt, his first wife.

THE ROYAL ACADEMY.—WINTER EXHIBITION. LORD LEIGHTON'S PICTURES.

(Second Notice.)

Having criticized what we have ventured to call the tentative pictures in this exhibition, we proceed to examine the best of those which stand pretty much on one level. No. 1, Moretta, of which, by the way, there is a good engraving, is the bust of a brunette of a rich golden-bronze hue, such as Leighton loved to paint, in whose bronze-black (not blue-black) hair is set a dark red flower. These tints are rendered more powerful by the contrast afforded by the greyish white of the frill about her throat. The prophet-green of the background is delicately harmonized with the flesh and tresses, and the modelling of the flesh is as charming as it is broad, simple, and refined. Noteworthy, too, are the firmness and precision of the touch with which the forms of the lips and nostrils are depicted. In the half-length Portrait of Mrs. F. P. Cockerell (3) the flesh painting is of nearly equal value, although the lady is a pure and brilliant English blonde, with light brown hair, dressed in bright white silk with black trimmings. A dark blue flower in her bosom serves to complete the gay and homogeneous colour scheme of Leighton's devising—just as Moretta's red flower served in her portrait. Here the modelling of the flesh and the drawing (the visitor who can draw will fully appreciate the execution of Mrs. Cockerell's black trimmings) are delicate beyond praise, but the touch is broader. On the other hand, The Vestal (4) illustrates some of the weaknesses of Leighton's sentiment (it might almost be called sentimentality), and also of his technique, which in this case is almost feeble. Begun in the last month of the artist's life, it remains unfinished, and should be compared with the other Vestal (16) of 1883 (the original of a very popular print), a beautiful damsel, whose forms, however, are English rather than antique, and who wears, instead of a veil, a fine piece of white Indian embroidery. No. 16 is, in short, a very choice exercise in white, and the tones are delicate and silvery; but we care little for its sentiment.

Weaving the Wreath (6) belongs to a class of studies in colour and pure, strong, and soft rather than brilliant light, combined with really classical grace and types of physical beauty which are less eclectic than those Leighton mostly affected. The silvery lights upon her dress as well as its local colour assort finely with the bronze-like inner gold of her flesh. The dark green of the bay-leaves she is binding together is charming to those who enjoy its relationship to the pale amber of her tunic, while the deep tones of the figure and her very dark blue dress are most beautifully relieved against the warm and somewhat rosy white of the marble wall behind her. We could hardly praise No. 6 more highly than by saying that it is a work quite in Mr. Alma Tadema's vein; but it possesses greater breadth of tone and the coloration is simpler.

Browning pronounced Hercules wrestling with Death (7)

Worthy to set up in our Poikilé, and perhaps Sir Bernhard Samuelson, to whom it belongs, will take the hint, and bestow the picture on the public gallery which is unfortunately being erected in the damp, smoky, and dreary region on the banks of the Thames. The design suffers signally from its association with the conventionalities of the Greek drama. In spite of the beauty of many of its elements, especially of the colour scheme, it sadly lacks spontaneity, and the art of the composition (a group of but too well-balanced members) is not artful enough to conceal itself, being, indeed, much less masterly than is usual with Leighton, who generally was an admirable composer, except when he was dealing with a scene on the stage, as in No. 62, where Count Paris visits the seemingly dead Juliet. The symmetry of the parts of No. 7, no less than the too great emphasis of its passion and the exaggeration of the expressions, is much too obvious. The colour scheme, fine as it is, is too Bolognese, to say nothing about its not harmonizing with anything Greek. The artist was, as we have said, hampered by the dramatized form of his theme.

So far, we have mostly considered Leighton as a colourist and designer, but we have said nothing of his dexterity in turning to account those resources which the felicitous imitation of nature, especially of textures and their varying brilliancy and tones, provides. Mrs. G. Holt's small whole-length of a little girl, which is rather timidly called a Study (8), furnishes ample proofs that he did not lack skill in methods of which Rubens is the great master. It is quite true that this is a sort of side issue, but we ought not to omit it, particularly as Leighton's position as a kind of arch-eclectic by no means implied that he ought to attempt to excel as a realist. Nevertheless, the child's rose-coloured satin is not only refined in colour, but it is among the most faithful pieces of painting per se that we know of. Its colour harmonizes most delightfully with the dark blue hanging behind the figure, and in that respect the picture may be classed with 'Weaving the Wreath.' The spiritual rapture which Invocation (9) expresses owes not a little to the singularly able manner in which the artist contrived to combine so much of realism as he cared to employ with his colour-scheme and the attitude of the tall, pale virgin who stands before us with both her arms upraised. In raising her arms on high she has lifted a part of her white robe. This being semi-transparent, and the strong daylight coming from the sky above the roofless interior of the temple, a sort of halo is formed round her head, while her features are chiefly illuminated by light reflected from the front of the picture, doubtless by the white marble wall which encloses the shrine. This reflected light imparts a singular charm to the wan and almost statuelike countenance of the virgin, and the purplish hue of her pallid lips is as true to the motive of the subject as the greyish-blueness of her eyes. Intense as the expression of her features is, their ecstasy impresses us all the more because the artist has adopted natural means to enhance the mystical aspect of the subject. In fact, eclectic as he was, Leighton seldom employed so much realism as in this case; and he never used it with more success. The fine drawing and modelling of the maiden's face, it may be added, redeem the more than questionable draughtsmanship of her arms and their by no means perfect proportions.

Mr. Aitchison's life-size bust of a dark-haired Roman Mother (11) is a study from the life, more than usually masculine for Leighton, and in its broad style and emphatic touch offering a sharp contrast to the subtlety of 'Invocation,' where every element at the command of the artist has been pressed into his service. "Hit!" (13) is a late picture, but the insight of the designer is thoroughly manifest in the attitude and features of the pupil, who, though delighted with his own success, is still surprised by it. The composition is most happy, but the figure and proportions of the man are less true than those of the youngster. The latter is a first-rate instance of the learning, sympathy, and accomplishments which the President brought to bear on painting adolescent figures.

The Antique Juggling Girl (15), well known by a charming print, is not felicitously named, because the beautiful nude girl who stands before us in front view is not, in the proper sense of the word, juggling. Although it may be hypercritical to demur to the drawing of her face, it is not excessive praise to say that the toning of her delicate carnations, shown as they are in a sort of half shadow, and opposed to the lighter and warmer curtain behind her, is as charming as it is subtle. Nor in the drawing and modelling of her figure is there any fault to be found, except that her right ankle seems a little thick, while her right hand is certainly too large. It hardly requires the knowledge of an artist rightly to perceive the beauty of her shoulders, her virginal bust, and the elegance of her flanks and lower limbs. Here Leighton profited by those studies of the antique which he never neglected, but which some people in our day pretend to undervalue, although, in fact, all they know about them is that they are difficult and also stringent tests of taste. Of course, one of the greatest tasks imposed upon the painter's skill was to succeed in placing the nude figure—standing in a half shadow as it is, and yet distinct in light reflected from the front and of no great strength (in this differing from the face of the devotee in 'Invocation')—so that, without positive shadows on any part, it appears solid and round, and is not "cut up" nor harshly defined against the lighter background, and yet there is no sacrifice of the golden and rosy tints of the youthful flesh.

The almost sculpturesque features and stately form of Corinna of Tanagra (17) show how great attention Leighton had devoted to those noble types of Greek sculpture which may be attributed to the year 480 B.C. and thereabouts, and which were more lifelike than the architectonic conventions of such buildings as the Parthenon—whether earlier or later matters not — permitted the artists of that epoch to employ. Apart from this, the look of the poetess is somewhat stern and majestic, and the grandeur of her aspect, apart from the self-control which the entire figure and, still more, the face emphasize, is quite worthy of Leighton's Greek models. In fact, this is one of his most successful exercises in style, a most precious element of art, which it has been truly said that he cultivated with greater zeal and had more knowledge of than most men in this country, or, for that matter, on the Continent either. The coloration is excellent, especially the face, and the intensely blue-black hair and the reddish amber of the robe which falls about her

> In great folds and laps of sculptor's work.

Mrs. Leathart's David (18), a work nearly thirty years earlier than 'Corinna,' and yet not, relatively speaking, belonging to Leighton's youth, serves to show the artist's power of dealing with real, not theatrical tragedy. The design is as complete as it is pathetic, its purpose being expressed by the simplest means: the single figure clad in the darkest, most mournful blue, not only harmonizes with, but forms a mass with, the lurid greyness and impressive gloom of the enormous clouds which, as they roll apart, reveal the splendid sunset, which gives expression to the otherwise aimless flight of the doves, and is the only brilliant element in the colour and tone schemes. Here, as we have already seen in other instances of Leighton's ability to grasp the whole of his themes, everything is made to subserve the expression of the motive of the design; there is not a superfluous feature; even the fact that David has taken off his crown and placed it at his feet helps the painter's purpose without in the least degree intruding upon the majestic mournfulness of his picture. Sister's Kiss (19), which, intentionally or by a happy chance, hangs next to 'David,' displays quite a different side of the President's powers. It is an idyl as delightful and blithe as it is pure, while, as before, every element is adapted to the ruling motive of the whole, from the glowing sunlight of the landscape background to the bright and rich light green of the elder girl's dress. Every one will admire the taste and skill which not only selected the colour of this dress, but adapted it so delicately to the contours of the girl's shoulders, bust, and waist, and thus at once expressed the suppleness and the grace of her figure. The vivacity and pretty imperiousness of the child who caresses her are as happily rendered as her own tender and willing submission.

The large and ambitious Cymon and Iphigenia (20), now belonging to Mr. Quilter, was painted more than twelve years ago, and we described it at some length as it stood on the easel in Kensington before it was sent to the Academy of 1884. It stood there alone then, and was the most important work Leighton had finished since the 'Daphnephoria' of 1876. We have now, alas! to consider it with regard to the whole of his life's labours. Always reckoning 'Daphnephoria' as his masterpiece, we are disposed to place Mr. Quilter's picture next to it, for the harmony of the subject and its treatment is more distinctly manifest than in most of the works we have already noticed. The fair huntress forms the central point of the composition. She is from head to foot flushed in rosy light, and this circumstance emphasizes the abandon of her attitude. Her companions, clad in darker draperies; the figure of Cymon, dressed in dark red and closely wrapped in his mantle; the dim landscape beyond, the low ridges of which catch the first rays of the just-risen moon, are all employed, not only to help the chiaroscuro of the picture, but to aid in the expression of a fine design which thus becomes homogeneous and complete. As a piece of painting per se the figure of Iphigenia may challenge comparison with any of Leighton's achievements of the same sort; the brush power employed on the overhanging foliage of the tree behind the sleeper is exemplary; the way in which the enormous disc of the newly rising moon emerges above the level horizon of the sea is a most impressive point, and worthy of Leighton at his best; it is, too, a capital instance of his ability to use natural phenomena to suit his purpose, and almost equal in value to those vast cloud masses, flushed by sunset, that impart so much grandeur to the picture of Clytie (22) which hangs close by.

Fine-Art Gossip.

On the 18th inst. there will be a meeting of members of the Old Society of Painters in Water Colours in order to elect new members and associates of the body.

We are glad to learn that, despite the desire of the local authorities to widen part of Bow Road by demolishing Bow Church, it has been decided not to entertain the proposal to that effect.

The interesting collection (unique of its kind) of antiquities formed by the late Rev. Montague Taylor, exhibited at South Kensington in 1862, and more recently at the Burlington Fine-Arts Club, will shortly be offered for sale at auction by Messrs. Christie, Manson & Woods.

A Correspondent writes :—

"There seems to be little doubt that the Dean and Chapter of Peterborough contemplate pulling down and rebuilding the central and southern gable of the west front of Peterborough Cathedral in addition to the northern gable, which has been already removed. With this end in view, the Dean and Chapter have invited the members of Council of the Royal Institute of British Architects to inspect the works in progress at the west front, although they refused to allow a deputation from the Society for the Protection of Ancient Buildings to have access to the building for the purpose of taking particulars for a specification of works necessary for the consolidation of the north gable. The Institute of Architects, as a body, look favourably on works of restoration, and as no fewer than seven members of the Council, together with the President, Mr. Geo. Aitchison, and four vice-presidents, have presented an address to Mr. Pearson, the architect to the Chapter, it is not difficult to surmise the object of the Dean and Chapter's invitation to the Institute and the probable outcome of the visit of the Council to Peterborough."

If the Dean and Chapter imagine that any value attaches to the pronouncements of the heterogeneous body that meets in Conduit Street, they most egregiously mistake. The editor of the Builder, no doubt having given assurance of being an advocate of destruction, has also, it seems, been "admitted to view."

A new picture by one or more of that composite group of painters we recognize under the name of Lenain has been added to the Louvre. It is the gift of M. Stéphane Bourgeois. It hangs near Poussin's 'Ravissement de St. Paul,' and represents a 'Réunion de Famille.'

At Athens the excavations of the Greek Archæological Society on the northern slopes of the Acropolis have brought to light some steps cut in the rock, leading to the Acropolis itself, through a small entrance known since 1885. This is the lower part of the staircase which was used by the Arrhephoroi for their descent from the Acropolis to the city during the Panathenaic feasts, and by which the Persians, according to Herodotus, crept up to the citadel.

The International Art Exhibition, which is to take place this year at Copenhagen, will be the first of the kind ever held in Scandinavia.

MUSIC

THE WEEK.

Queen's Hall.—The New Symphony Concerts.
St James's Hall.—Monday Popular Concerts.
Garrick Theatre.—'The Valkyrie.'

There is already but little doubt that the new series of Symphony Concerts, inaugurated by Mr. Robert Newman at the Queen's Hall last Saturday afternoon, will become a success artistically and substantially, for the room was quite full, a circumstance probably without parallel at the first of a series of orchestral performances. Opportunity was taken to introduce Alexander Glazounoff's Symphony in B flat, No. 5, Op. 55. The music of this comparatively young Russian composer, who was born at St. Petersburg in 1865, is not altogether unknown here, for two of his suites have been heard, and perhaps minor pieces. The Symphony in B flat is one of his latest efforts, for it was composed in 1895, and published last year. There is little distinctively Russian in the first three movements, but there is much Wagner, and something of Mendelssohn and Dvoràk. Far more of Glazounoff's nationality is displayed in the fiery and barbaric finale, with its strongly marked rhythm and strenuous orchestration. Another symphony by the same composer is to be produced at one of the forthcoming Philharmonic Concerts. Much of last Saturday's programme was devoted to Schubert, the items including the Unfinished Symphony in B minor, the Overture and Entr'acte in B flat from the 'Rosamunde' music, all superbly played by Mr. Henry Wood's orchestra, and three songs well rendered by Mr. Watkin Mills.

Schubert was again prominent at last Monday's Popular Concert, the programme commencing with the splendid Quartet in G, too rarely performed, owing to the greater popularity of the companion work in D minor, which, though exceedingly fine, is on the whole inferior to the work in G. Perhaps its "heavenly length" is against it, but it can never be heard without a feeling of intense admiration. Still greater is the String Quintet in C, Op. 163, composed in the last year of the composer's life, and by some regarded as the finest piece of chamber music ever written. The combination of instruments—that is to say, two violins, viola, and two violoncellos—is singularly effective, and the magnificent work was perfectly interpreted by Lady Halle and her usual associates. Songs were contributed with commendable taste by Miss Bertha Salter, whose contralto voice is steadily developing.

The performance of Wagner's 'Valkyrie' in English by the Carl Rosa Company at the Garrick Theatre was extremely creditable, although Wagner's score was sadly mutilated. Miss Alice Esty sang and acted charmingly as Sieglinde, Mr. Hedmondt was quite as praiseworthy as Siegmund, and Mr. Ludwig could not have been easily surpassed as Wotan. The Brünnhilde was Mlle. Rita Elandi, perfectly capable as a vocalist, but scarcely possessed of the physique for such a part. Miss Kirkby Lunn as Fricka and Mr. A. S. Winkworth as Hunding did well, and there was very little fault to find with the general performance under Herr Richard Eckhold. The stage arrangements, nevertheless, were far from being equal to Wagner's directions.

Musical Gossip.

It seems that the projected autumnal series of Philharmonic Concerts are arranged for the same Thursday evenings which are occupied by the Henschel performances. This clashing should be avoided if arrangements can be made to that effect.

Mlle. Giulia Ravogli has been studying oratorio under Miss Anna Williams, and will appear at the Chester Festival in the forthcoming summer in 'Elijah' and Dvoràk's 'Stabat Mater.'

The next series of concerts by the Musical Guild are fixed for Tuesday evenings, February 9th and 23rd and March 9th and 16th, at the Kensington Town Hall.

Mr. Frederic Lamond's third pianoforte recital at St. James's Hall on Tuesday afternoon was very sparsely attended, and it is somewhat curious that a Scottish pianist so richly gifted should be ill supported. Most certainly Mr. Lamond's rendering of Schumann's Fantasia in C, Op. 17, could not have been easily surpassed for sentiment, fluency, and intellectual feeling. There was, however, rather too much of the virtuoso as opposed to the artistic element in the scheme.

We desire to call attention again to the Music Section of the Victorian Loan Exhibition to be held at the Crystal Palace from May until September next. In addition to the exhibits and in indirect connexion with the Handel Festival there are to be festivals of choral societies, school celebrations, and various concerts of British music, vocal and instrumental.

A great success has been won by Miss Muriel Elliot, the very clever young English pianist, in Berlin, where she has given within the last few weeks an orchestral concert (at which she played three concertos) and also two recitals. English music and musicians seem to be making steady progress in the Fatherland.

Mr. Leonard Borwick had the misfortune to lose his father by sudden death last week. Mr. Borwick is perhaps the most gifted of English living pianists, and his sad bereavement will be much regretted by his many friends.

The London branch of the United Wagner Society announces that it must diminish its labours during the present year, owing to the decreasing number of members. A conversazione can, therefore, not be promised, and funds are requested for the completion of the issue of the master's prose, which, it is calculated, will extend to the end of 1899. To this extent the Society may fulfil a useful mission ; after that it may properly dissolve, for Wagner needs no more advocating in art circles. His many-sided genius is now fully recognized in every direction.

A concert is to be given on the 1st of May in the Queen's Hall, in aid of the Caxton Convalescent Home at Limpsfield. 1,000*l.* is required to free the home from debt.

Handel's oratorio 'Hercules,' which has not been performed in London for many years, was given for the first time recently at Leipzig by the Riedel Verein, the version rendered being that of the well-known Handelian scholar Dr. Chrysander, who has done so much in the interests of the Anglo-Saxon master's works.

So many Schubert Centenary celebrations have been given during the past few days that reference to them all would be impossible. It may be said here, however, that the hundredth anniversary of the Viennese composer's birth has been worthily kept in many places where during his life he was scarcely known.

DRAMA

THE WEEK.

Lyceum.—Revival of Wills's 'Olivia.'
Olympic.—'The Free Pardon,' a Drama in Four Acts. By F. C. Philips and Leonard Merrick.

It is always pleasant to welcome a revival of the 'Olivia' of W. G. Wills. That work furnishes an admirable instance of adaptation, is very touching and pathetic, and supplies Miss Terry as the heroine with one of her best characters, if not the best character in which she has been seen. Since it was first produced at the Court Theatre, March 30th, 1878, it has been frequently given, and always with Miss Terry as Olivia. A lovelier or more affecting impersonation has not been witnessed, and it has lost now apparently nothing of its tenderness, juvenility, and grace. As Sir Henry's accident prevents him from taking the part of the Vicar, that character has been entrusted to Mr. Hermann Vezin, the original exponent. Mr. Vezin gives it once more with the crystal lucidity of his style, and with a beauty of elocution by which it profits. It has not the warmth and colour of Irving, nor quite the tenderness either. We were once inclined to regard that tenderness as excessive, a heresy we now recant. Nothing in the remainder of the cast calls for notice, the general performance being scarcely up to Lyceum traditions.

On the strength of one situation which is ingenious and novel, 'The Free Pardon' escapes condemnation, and even claims a measure of consideration. Feeble enough is the thread of the story, the characters are conventional, and the effects have been anticipated. Not wholly new is, indeed, the situation to which we have alluded. The means by which, though a perfectly innocent man, Eric Annesley, ex-officer of Lancers, has found himself branded as a patricide and sent to consort with thieves at Portland, need not be told. At Portland, however, he is at the moment when a fog and an émeute among the convicts give him an opportunity, of which he avails himself, to escape. His flight is directed to the hut in which dwells Mrs. Twentyman, formerly a lady's-maid in his family, and now wife of one of the warders. By her he is cheerfully sheltered, fresh clothes are given him, and means are found for effecting his escape to the mainland. At the moment when all is ready Twentyman returns. He is under deepest obligation to the fugitive, in whose regiment he has been, and by whom his life has been saved in action. Will gratitude or duty prevail? Who shall tell? Mrs. Twentyman at least will not trust him, and she gives the signal concerted on for Annesley to escape. Her hesitation and confusion, the fact that the door of her bedroom is locked and the key cannot be found, and the signal she has been giving rouse the warder to a jealous fury, and he brands his wife as an outcast. The door is then burst open from within, and the escaping prisoner surrenders himself. He has heard the dispute and the accusation, and he will forego the meditated and all but accomplished escape rather than leave in doubt the fair fame of the woman who has sheltered him. This scene is fresh, well worked, and sympathetic. Had the play been all up to this level it would have deserved warm recognition. Most of it, however, is conventional, and portions of it are trivial. It was decently, but not remarkably acted. The matter of chief interest in the performance was the assumption by Mr. Abingdon (whose line is usually confined to villains) of a light-comedy part. The experiment was not wholly a success.

Sophocles and Shakspere (Cambridge, Macmillan & Bowes) is the title in brief of a prize essay in Latin by Mr. L. Horton Smith, now published as a book. The author compares the tragic art of the two poets with considerable ability. The obvious lines of difference are mostly followed. Sophocles's celebrated comparison of himself and Euripides is here, and, we believe, generally mistranslated. He did not say that he "represented men as they ought to be," but "as they ought to be (represented)." Generally Sophocles is not such plain sailing as Mr. Horton Smith suggests. The use of prose and verse in Shakspeare (pp. 68–70) is well treated, but we miss an adequate apology for his coarseness and the turgid stuff of his inferior plays. Some other positions here taken up need considerable modification to be tenable. To talk of the three styles of Shakspeare may be convenient, but they are no more clearly made out than in the case of Wagner. The book is overloaded with references, many as unnecessary as the five to Notes and Queries for the origin of a Latin tag on p. 54.

Dramatic Gossip.

'The Prodigal Father' of Mr. Glen Macdonough, imported from America and produced by Mr. John S. Clarke at the Strand, seems to have been partly inspired by 'Tartarin of Tarascon.' We have at least the spectacle of a man honoured by his compatriots as an explorer of remote and unvisited regions, whose travels have not extended beyond the country houses visited by a too fascinating "star" of the music-halls. As the heroine of the piece, Miss Florence Gerard reappeared in London, as did Mr. Charles Collette, who gave an eccentric picture of a journalist. Mr. Harry Paulton was the hero. The whole is trivial and extravagant, but was received with boisterous applause. Miss Gerard also played in 'A Merry Christmas,' a not very brilliant adaptation of 'Je dine chez ma Mère.'

Miss Violet Vanbrugh is recovering under the influence of rest, and will, it is hoped, shortly reappear with her husband on the stage.

This evening will be given at the Lyric the long promised performance of Mr. Wilson Barrett's new drama 'The Daughters of Babylon.'

'Nelson's Enchantress' is the title of the new play in which Mrs. Patrick Campbell and Mr. Forbes Robertson will appear at the Avenue on Thursday next.

The 'Princess and the Butterfly; or, the Fantastics,' is the title of a new five-act comedy by Mr. Pinero, which will be produced at the St. James's.

After playing at Boston with great success, Mr. Tree is expected in England, where he will be met with the intelligence that he is again a father.

At the St. James's Theatre the part of Phœbe in 'As You Like It' is now sustained by Miss Ellis Jeffreys.

Mr. and Mrs. Kendal began at Cambridge on Monday a country tour, which is intended to last until May, when they hope to reappear in London. In their repertory are Mr. Grundy's comedy 'The Greatest of These' and Mr. Allen Upward's new play 'A Flash in the Pan.'

'A Dramatic Legend,' by Ernst von Wildenbruch, is to be performed at the Hoftheater, Berlin, on March 22nd in honour of the centenary of the birth of Kaiser Wilhelm I.

The death is announced at Berlin of Dr. Ed. Jacobson, who was one of the most prolific Possendichter of Germany.
